THE WOOD OF LA SAUDRAIE

I.

THE WOOD OF LA SAUDRAIE

During the last days of May, 1793, one of the Parisian regiments thrown into Brittany by Santerre reconnoitred the dreaded wood of La Saudraie in Astillé. There were not more than three hundred men, for the battalion had been well-nigh swept off by this fierce war. It was the period when, after Argonne, Jemmapes, and Valmy, of the first regiment of Paris, which had numbered six hundred volunteers, there remained twenty-seven men, of the second, thirty-three, and of the third, fifty-seven. It was a time of epic conflicts.

The regiments sent from Paris into the Vendée counted nine hundred and twelve men. Each regiment took with it three pieces of cannon. They had been quickly put on foot. On the twenty-fifth of April, Gohier being minister of justice and Bouchotte minister of war, the section of the Bon-Conseil proposed sending battalions of volunteers into the Vendée; Lubin, a member of the commune, had made the report; on the first of May, Santerre was ready to marshal twelve thousand soldiers, thirty field-pieces, and a troop of gunners. These battalions, formed so quickly, were formed so well that they to-day serve as models; regiments of the line are constructed as they were, they changed the old proportion between the number of soldiers and the number of non-commissioned officers.

On the twenty-eighth of April the Commune of Paris gave this pass-word to the volunteers of Santerre: No mercy. No quarter. At the end of May, of the twelve thousand who left Paris, eight thousand were dead.

The regiment engaged in the wood of La Saudraie held itself on the watch. They did not hurry. Each man looked at once to the right and to the left, before and behind; Kleber has said: "A soldier has an eye in his back." They had been on foot for a long while. What time could it be? what period of the day was it? It would have been difficult to say, for there is always a sort of dusk in such savage thickets, and it was never light in that wood.

The forest of La Saudraie was tragic. It was in its depths that, in the month of November, 1792, civil war had commenced its crimes; Mousqueton, the ferocious cripple came from its fatal shades; the list of the murders that had been committed there made one's hair stand on end. There was no place more to be dreaded. The soldiers moved forward cautiously. The woods were full of flowers; on each side was a trembling wall of branches from whence came the sweet freshness of the leaves; here and there rays of sunlight pierced the green shadows on the ground; the gladiola, that flame of the marshes, the meadow narcissus, the little wood daisy, the harbinger of good weather, the vernal crocus, bordered and embroidered the thick carpet of vegetation, crowded with every form of moss, from that resembling velvet to that which looks like a star. The soldiers advanced step by step in silence, softly pushing aside the brushwood. The birds twittered above the bayonets.

La Saudraie was one of those thickets in which formerly, in time of peace, they used to have a Houiche-ba, which is the hunting of birds by night; now they hunted men there.

The thicket was one of birch-trees, beeches and oaks; the ground flat; the thick moss and grass deadened the sound of the men's steps; no paths, or rather only blind ones, which quickly disappeared; holly, wild sloes, ferns, hedges of rest-harrow, and tall brambles; it would have been impossible to distinguish a man ten feet away. Now and then a heron or a moor-hen flew through the branches, indicating the neighborhood of marshes.

They pushed forward. They went at random, with uneasiness, fearing to find that which they sought.

From time to time they came upon traces of encampments; burned spots, trampled grass, sticks arranged crosswise, branches stained with blood. Here soup had been made, there mass had been said, yonder they had dressed wounds. But those who had passed had disappeared. Where were they? Very far away, perhaps? perhaps quite near, hidden, blunderbuss in hand. The wood seemed deserted. The regiment redoubled its prudence. Solitude, hence distrust. They saw no one; so much more reason for fearing some one. They had to do with a forest with a bad name.

An ambush was probable.

Thirty grenadiers, detached as scouts, and commanded by a sergeant, marched at a considerable distance in front of the main body. The vivandière of the battalion accompanied them. The vivandières willingly join the vanguard. They run risks, but they have the chance of seeing whatever happens. Curiosity is one of the forms of feminine bravery.

Suddenly the soldiers of this little advance party started, like hunters who have neared the hiding-place of their prey. They had heard something like a breathing in the centre of a thicket, and seemed to perceive a movement among the branches. The soldiers made signals.

In the sort of watch and search confided to scouts, the officers have small need to interfere; the right thing seems done by instinct.

In less than a minute the spot where the movement had been noticed was surrounded; a line of pointed muskets encircled it; the dense centre of the thicket was covered on all sides at the same instant, and the soldiers, fingers on triggers, eyes on the suspected spot, waited only for the sergeant's order.

Notwithstanding this, the vivandière ventured to peer through the underbrush, and, at the moment when the sergeant was about to cry: "Fire!" this woman cried: "Stop!"

And turning toward the soldiers: "Do not fire, comrades!"

She plunged into the thicket. The men followed.

There was, in truth, some one there.

In the thickest of the brake, on the edge of one of those little round clearings left by the fires of the charcoal-burners, in a sort of recess among the branches, a kind of chamber of foliage, half open like an alcove, a woman was seated on the moss, holding to her breast a nursing babe, while the fair heads of two sleeping children rested on her knees.

This was the ambush.

"What are you doing here, you?" cried the vivandière.

The woman lifted her head.

The vivandière added, furiously:

"Are you mad, that you are there!"

And she continued:

"A little more and you would have been blown to pieces!"

And, addressing herself to the soldiers, the vivandière added:

"It is a woman."

"The devil, that is plain to be seen!" said a grenadier.

The vivandière continued:

"To come into the wood to get yourself killed! The idea of such stupidity!"

The woman, stunned, frightened, petrified, looked about her, like one in a dream, at these guns, these sabres, these bayonets, these savage faces.

The two children awoke and cried.

"I am hungry," said one.

"I am afraid," said the other.

The baby was still suckling.

The vivandière spoke to it.

"You are the sensible one," said she.

The mother was dumb with terror.

The sergeant cried to her:

"Do not be afraid, we are the battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge."

The woman trembled from head to foot. She stared at the sergeant, of whose rough visage there was nothing visible but the moustaches, the brows, and the eyes like two burning coals.

"Formerly the battalion of the Red Cross," added the vivandière.

"Who are you, madame?"

The woman stared at him, terrified. She was slender, young, pale, in rags; she wore the large hood of the Breton peasant and the woolen cloak fastened about her neck by a string. She left her bosom exposed with the indifference of an animal. Her feet, without stockings or shoes, were bleeding.

"It is a beggar," said the sergeant.

And the vivandière began anew, in a voice at once soldierly and feminine, but sweet:

"What is your name?"

The woman stammered so that she was scarcely intelligible:

"Michelle Fléchard."

Meanwhile the vivandière stroked, with her large hand, the little head of the nursing babe. "How old is this mite?" asked she.

The mother did not understand. The vivandière persisted.

"I ask you how old is it?"

"Ah!" said the mother. "Eighteen months."

"It is old enough," said the vivandière. "It ought not to suckle any longer. I must wean it. We will give it some soup."

The mother began to feel a certain confidence. The two children, who had awakened, were rather curious than scared. They admired the plumes of the soldiers.

"Ah!" said the mother, "they are very hungry."

Then she added—"I have no more milk."

"We will give them something to eat," cried the sergeant; "and you also. But that's not all. What are your political opinions?"

The woman looked at the sergeant and did not reply.

"Did you hear my question?"

She stammered:

"I was put into a convent very young, but I am married, I am not a nun. The sisters taught me to speak French. The village was set on fire. We ran away so quickly that I had not time to put on my shoes."

"I ask you what are your political opinions?"

"I don't know what that means."

The sergeant continued:

"There are such things as female spies. We shoot them, these spies. Come. Speak. You are not a gypsy? What is your country?"

She still looked at him as if she did not understand. The sergeant repeated:

"What is your country?"

"I do not know," said she.

"What! You do not know your own country?"

"Ah! my country. Oh, yes, I know that."

"Well, what is it?"

The woman replied:

"The farm of Siscoignard, in the parish of Azé."

It was the sergeant's turn to be stupefied. He remained thoughtful for a moment. Then he resumed: "You said?"

"Siscoignard."

"That's not a country, that isn't."

"It is my country."

And the woman, after an instant's reflection, added: "I understand, monsieur. You are from France, I belong to Brittany."

"Well?"

"It is not the same neighborhood."

"But it is the same country!" cried the sergeant.

The woman simply repeated:

"I am from Siscoignard."

"Siscoignard, so be it!" answered the sergeant. "Your family belong there?"

"Yes."

"What is their occupation?"

"They are all dead. I have nobody left."

The sergeant, who thought himself a fine talker, continued his interrogatory.

"What, the devil! One has relations, or one has had! Who are you? Speak."

The woman listened, astounded, this—"or one has had," which was more like the growl of an animal than any human sound.

The vivandière felt the necessity of interfering. She again began to caress the suckling babe, and to pat the cheeks of the two other children.

"How do you call the baby?" asked she; "for it is a little girl, this one?"

The mother replied: "Georgette."

"And the eldest fellow? For he is a man, the little rascal."

"René-Jean."

"And the younger? He is a man, too, and chubby-faced in the bargain."

"Gros-Alain," said the mother.

"They are pretty little fellows," said the vivandière; "they already look as if they were somebody!"

Still the sergeant persisted.

"Now speak, madame. Have you a house?"

"I had one."

"Where was it?"

"At Azé."

"Why are you not in your house?"

"Because they burned it."

"Who?"

"I do not know. A battle."

"Where did you come from?"

"From there."

"Where are you going?"

"I don't know."

"Get to the facts! Who are you?"

"I don't know."

"You don't know who you are?"

"We are people who are running away."

"What party do you belong to?"

"I don't know."

"Are you Blues? Are you Whites? Who are you with?"

"I am with my children."

There was a pause. The vivandière said:

"As for me, I have no children. I have not had time."

The sergeant began again.

"But your parents! See here, madame, give us the facts about your parents. My name is Radoub, I am a sergeant, from the street of Cherche-Midi; my father and mother belonged there. I can talk about my parents. Tell us about yours. Who were they?"

"They were Fléchards. That's all."

"Yes, the Fléchards are the Fléchards, just as the Radoubs are the Radoubs. But people have a calling. What was your parents' calling? What was their business? How did they support themselves, these Fléchards of yours?"

"They were laborers. My father was sickly and could not work on account of a beating that the lord—his lord—our lord—had given to him, it was a kindness, for my father had poached a rabbit, a thing for which one was condemned to death; but the lord showed him mercy, and said: 'You need only give him a hundred blows with a stick;' and my father was left crippled."

"And then?"

"My grandfather was a Huguenot. Monsieur the curê had him sent to the galleys. I was very little at the time."

"And then?"

"My husband's father smuggled salt. The king had him hung."

"And your husband, what did he do?"

"Lately he fought."

"For whom?"

"For the king."

"And afterward?"

"Well, for his lordship."

"And next?"

"Well, then for the curé."

"A thousand bloody names of brutes!" cried a grenadier.

The woman gave a start of terror.

"You see, madame, we are Parisians," said the vivandière graciously.

The woman clasped her hands and exclaimed:

"Oh, my God and blessed Jesus!"

"No superstitious ejaculations!" growled the sergeant.

The vivandière seated herself by the woman, and drew the eldest child, who submitted quietly, between her knees. Children are reassured, as they are frightened, without any apparent reason. Some internal monitor warns them.

"My poor, good woman of this neighborhood, your brats are very pretty, babies are always so. I can guess their ages. The big one is four years old; his brother is three. Upon my word, the little sucking poppet is a greedy one. Oh! the monster! Will you stop eating up your mother like that! See here, madame, do not be afraid. You ought to join the battalion. Do like me. I call myself Houzarde. It is a nickname. But I like Houzarde better than being called Mamzelle Bicorneau, like my mother. I am the canteen-woman, that is the same as saying, she who offers drink when they are firing and killing one another. The devil and his train. Our feet are about the same size, I will give you a pair of my shoes. I was in Paris the tenth of August. I gave Westermann a drink. How things went. I saw Louis XVI., Louis Capet, as they call him, guillotined. It was against his will. Only just listen, now! To think that on the thirteenth of January he roasted chestnuts and laughed with his family! When they forced him down on the see-saw, as they call it, he had neither coat nor shoes; he had nothing but his shirt, a quilted waistcoat, gray cloth breeches, and gray silk stockings. I saw that, I did! The hackney-coach they brought him in was painted green. See here, come with us. The regiment are good fellows; you shall be canteen number two; I will teach you the business. Oh! it is very simple! you have your can and your hand-bell, away you go into the hubbub, into the platoons firing, among the cannon balls, into the thickest of the row, and you cry, 'Who'll have a drop to drink, my children?' It's no more trouble than that. I give everybody and anybody a sup. My faith, yes. To Whites as well as to Blues, though I am a Blue. And a good Blue, too. But I give them all a drink. Wounded men are all thirsty. They die without any difference of opinions. Dying fellows ought to shake hands. How silly it is to go fighting! Do come with us. If I am killed, you will step into my place. You see, I am only so-so to look at, but I am a good woman and a brave chap. Don't you be afraid."

When the vivandière ceased speaking, the woman murmured:

"Our neighbor was called Marie-Jeanne, and our servant was named Marie-Claude."

In the meantime Sergeant Radoub reprimanded the grenadier.

"Hold your tongue. You have frightened madame. One does not swear before ladies."

"All the same, it is a downright butchery for an honest man to hear about," replied the grenadier; "and to see Chinese Iroquois, that have had their fathers-in-law crippled by a lord, their grandfathers sent to the galleys by the priest, and their fathers hung by the king, and who fight, name of the little Black Man! and mix themselves up with revolts, and get themselves smashed for his lordship, the priest, and the king!"

The sergeant cried: "Silence in the ranks!"

"A man may hold his tongue, sergeant," returned the grenadier; "but that doesn't hinder the fact that it's a pity to see a pretty woman like this running the risk of getting her face smashed for the sake of a little coxcomb."

"Grenadier," said the sergeant, "we are not in the Pike-club of Paris. No eloquence."

And he turned toward the woman:

"And your husband, madame? What is he doing? What has become of him?"

"There hasn't anything become of him, because they killed him."

"Where?"

"In the hedge."

"When?"

"Three days ago."

"Who did it?"

"I don't know."

"What! You do not know who killed your husband?"

"No."

"Was it a Blue? Was it a White?"

"It was a bullet."

"And that was three days ago?"

"Yes."

"In what direction?"

"Toward Ernée. My husband fell. That is all."

"And what have you been doing since your husband was killed?"

"Taking away my children."

"Where are you taking them?"

"Straight ahead."

"Where do you sleep?"

"On the ground."

"What do you eat?"

"Nothing."

The sergeant made that military grimace which makes the moustache touch the nose.

"Nothing?"

"That is to say, sloes and dried mulberries left from last year, myrtle seeds, and fern shoots."

"Yes. You might as well say nothing."

The eldest of the children, who seemed to understand, said: "I am hungry."

The sergeant took a bit of regulation bread from his pocket, and handed it to the mother. The mother broke the bread into two pieces, and gave them to the children. The little ones ate ravenously.

"She has kept none for herself," grumbled the sergeant.

"Because she is not hungry," said a soldier.

"Because she is a mother," said the sergeant.

The children interrupted the dialogue.

"I want a drink," cried one.

"I want a drink," repeated the other.

"There is no brook in this devil's wood," said the sergeant.

The vivandière took the brass cup which hung at her belt beside her hand-bell, turned the cock of the can she carried slung over her shoulder, poured a few drops into the cup, and held it to the children's lips.

The first drank and made a grimace.

The second drank and spat it out.

"Nevertheless it is good," said the vivandière.

"Is it some of the old cut-throat?" asked the sergeant.

"Yes, and the best. But these are peasants."

And she wiped her cup.

The sergeant resumed:

"And so, madame, you are trying to escape?"

"There is nothing else left for me to do."

"Across fields, whichever way chance directs?"

"I run with all my might, then I walk, then I fall."

"Poor villager!" said the vivandière.

"The people fight," stammered the woman. "They are shooting all around me. I do not know what they want. They killed my husband. That is all I know."

The sergeant grounded the butt of his musket till the earth rang, and cried:

"What a beast of a war! In the hangman's name!"

The woman continued:

"Last night, we slept in an émousse."

"All four?"

"All four."

"Slept?"

"Slept."

"Then," said the sergeant, "you slept standing."

And he turned toward the soldiers.

"Comrades, an old hollow tree-trunk that a man may fit himself into as if it were a sheath these savages call that an émousse. But what would you? We cannot all be Parisians."

"Slept in a hollow tree!" exclaimed the vivandière, "and with three children!"

"And," added the sergeant, "when the little ones howled, it must have seemed odd to anybody passing by and seeing nothing whatever, to hear a tree cry, 'Papa! mamma!'"

"Luckily it is summer," sighed the woman.

She looked down upon the ground, in silent resignation, her eyes filled with the bewilderment of wretchedness.

The soldiers made a silent circle round this group of misery.

A widow, three orphans, flight, abandonment, solitude, war muttering around the horizon, hunger, thirst, no other nourishment than the herbs of the field, no other roof than that of heaven.

The sergeant approached the woman, and fixed his eyes on the nursing child. The little one left the breast, turned its head gently, gazed with its beautiful blue orbs into the formidable hairy face, bristling and wild, which bent toward it, and began to smile.

The sergeant raised himself, and they saw a great tear roll down his cheek and cling like a pearl to the end of his moustache.

He lifted his voice.

"Comrades, from all this I conclude that the regiment is going to become a father. Is it agreed? We adopt these three children."

"Hurrah for the Republic!" cried the grenadiers.

"It is decided!" said the sergeant.

And he stretched his two hands above the mother and her babes.

"Behold the children of the battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge!"

The vivandière leaped for joy.

"Three heads under one bonnet!" cried she.

Then she burst into sobs, embraced the poor widow wildly, and said to her:

"What a rogue the little girl looks already!"

"Vive la République!" repeated the soldiers.

And the sergeant said to the mother:

"Come, citizeness!"

BOOK TWO

THE CORVETTE CLAYMORE

I.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE IN CONCERT

In the spring of 1793, at the moment when France, simultaneously attacked on all its frontiers, suffered the pathetic distraction of the downfall of the Girondists, this was what happened in the Archipelago of La Manche.

One evening, the first of June, at Jersey, from the solitary little Bay of Bonnenuit, about an hour before sunset, in that kind of foggy weather which is favorable to flight because it is dangerous for the navigator, a corvette got under way. The vessel was manned by a French crew, though it made part of the English fleet stationed on the look-out at the eastern point of the island. The Prince de La Tour-d'Auvergne, who was of the house of Bouillon, commanded the English flotilla, and it was by his orders, and for an urgent and special service, that the corvette had been detached.

This corvette, entered at Trinity House under the name of the Claymore, had the appearance of a transport but was in reality a corvette of war. She had the heavy, pacific look of a merchantman; but it would not have been safe to trust to that. She had been built for a double purpose—cunning and strength: to deceive if possible, to fight if necessary. For the service before her this night, the lading of the lower deck had been replaced by thirty carronades of heavy calibre. Either because a storm was feared, or because it was desirable to prevent the vessel having a suspicious appearance, these carronades were housed, that is to say, securely fastened within by triple chains, and the hatches above shut close; nothing was to be seen from without; the ports were blinded; the slides closed; it was as if the corvette had put on a mask. The carronades were of the old pattern, with brass wheels. Armed corvettes carry guns only on the upper deck; but this one, built for surprise and cunning, had the deck free, and was able, as we have just seen, to carry a battery below. The Claymore was after a heavy, stumpy model, but a good sailer nevertheless; the hull of the most solid sort used in the English navy, and in battle she was almost as valuable as a frigate, though for mizzen she had only a small mast of brigantine rig. Her rudder, of a peculiar and scientific form, had a curved frame, of unique shape, which cost fifty pounds sterling in the dock-yards of Southampton.

The crew, all French, was composed of refugee officers and deserter sailors. They were tried men; not one but was a good sailor, a good soldier, and a good royalist. They had a threefold fanaticism, for ship, sword, and king.

A half-regiment of marines, that could be disembarked in case of need, was added to the crew.

The corvette Claymore had for her captain a chevalier of Saint-Louis, Comte du Boisberthelot, one of the best officers of the old Royal Navy, for second, the Chevalier de La Vieuville, who had commanded a company of French guards in which Hoche had been sergeant, and for pilot, Philip Gacquoil, the most skillful mariner in Jersey.

It was evident that the vessel had unusual business on hand. Indeed, a man who had just come on board had the air of one entering upon an adventure. He was a tall old man, upright and robust, with a severe countenance, whose age it would have been difficult to guess accurately, for he seemed at once old and young; one of those men who are full of years and of vigor; who have white hair on their heads and lightning in their glance; forty in point of energy and eighty in power and authority. As he came on deck his sea-cloak blew open, exposing his large, loose breeches, called bragou-bras, top-boots, and a goat-skin vest which had one side tanned and embroidered with silk, while on the other the hair was left rough and bristling, a complete costume of the Breton peasant. These old-fashioned Breton jackets answered alike for workdays and holidays, and they could be turned to show the hairy or embroidered side, as one pleased ; goat-skin all the week, gala accoutrements on Sunday. As if to increase a resemblance which had been carefully studied, the peasant dress worn by the old man was threadbare at the knees and elbows, and seemed to have been long in use, while his sea-cloak, of some coarse cloth, might have belonged to a fisherman. This old man had on his head the round hat of the period, tall, and with a broad rim, which, when turned down, gave the wearer a rustic look, and when fastened up at the side with a loop and a cockade, had a military appearance. He wore his hat with the brim turned down, peasant fashion, without either tassels or cockade.

Lord Balcarras, the governor of the island, and the Prince de La Tour-d'Auvergne, had in person conducted and brought him on board. The secret agent of the princes, Gélambre, formerly one of the body-guard of M. le Comte d'Artois, had superintended the arrangement of the cabin, and, although himself a nobleman, pushed courtesy and respect so far as to walk behind the old man carrying his portmanteau. When they left him to go ashore again, M. de Gélambre saluted the peasant profoundly; Lord Balcarras said to him: "Good luck, general," and the Prince de La Tour-d'Auvergne added: "Au revoir, my cousin!"

"The peasant," that was the name by which the crew immediately designated their passenger during the short dialogues which seamen hold; but, without understanding any more about the matter, they well knew that this peasant was no more a peasant than the corvette of war was a common trading sloop.

There was little wind. The Claymore left Bonnenuit, passed in front of Boulay-Bay, and was for some time in sight, tacking to windward; then she lessened in the gathering night, and finally disappeared.

An hour after, Gélambre, having returned to his house at Saint-Helier, sent by the Southampton express the four following lines to the M. le Comte d'Artois, at the Duke of York's headquarters: "Monseigneur,—The departure has just taken place. Success certain. In eight days the whole coast will be on fire from Granville to Saint-Malo."

Four days previous, the representative Prieur de la Marne, on a mission to the army of the coast of Cherbourg, and at that time residing at Granville, had received by a secret emissary this message, written in the same hand as the dispatch above, the message was as follows:

"Citizen Representative,—On the first of June, at the hour when the tide turns, the corvette of war Claymore, with a masked battery, will set sail for the purpose of landing upon the shore of France a man of whom this is a description: tall, old, white hair, peasant's dress, hands of an aristocrat. I will send you more details to-morrow. He will land on the morning of the 2d. Warn the cruisers, capture the corvette, guillotine the man."

II.

NIGHT ON THE VESSEL AND WITH THE PASSENGER

The corvette, instead of going south and making for Sainte-Catharine, had headed north, then veered to the west, and resolutely entered the arm of the sea, between Sark and Jersey, called the Passage de la Déroute. At that time there was no light-house upon any point along either coast.

The sun had set clear; the night was dark, darker than summer nights ordinarily are; there was a moon, but vast clouds, rather of the equinox than the solstice, veiled the sky, and, according to all appearance, the moon would not be visible till she touched the horizon, at the moment of setting. A few clouds hung low over the water and covered it with mist.

All this obscurity was favorable.

The intention of Pilot Gacquoil was to leave Jersey on the left and Guernsey on the right, and to gain, by bold sailing between the Hanois and the Douvres, some bay of the Saint-Malo shore, a route less short than that by the Minquiers, but safer, as the French cruisers had standing orders to keep an especially keen watch between Saint-Hélier and Granville.

If the wind were favorable, if nothing occurred, and by setting all sail on the corvette, Jacquoil hoped to reach the French coast at daybreak.

All went well. The corvette had passed Gros-Nez; toward nine o'clock, the weather looked dirty, as sailors say, and there was both wind and sea; but the wind was good, and the sea was strong without being violent. Still, now and then the waves swept over the vessel's bows.

The "peasant" whom Lord Balcarras had called "General," and to whom the Prince de La Tour-d'Auvergne had said: "My cousin," had a sailor's step, and paced the deck with tranquil gravity. He did not even seem to notice that the corvette rolled considerably. From time to time he took a cake of chocolate out of his vest pocket and munched a morsel, his white hair did not prevent his having all his teeth.

He spoke to no one, except, now and then, a few low, quick words, to the captain, who listened with deference and seemed to consider this passenger, rather than himself, the commander.

The Claymore, ably piloted, skirted, unperceived in the fog the long bluff north of Jersey, hugging the shore, on account of the formidable reef Pierres-de-Leeq which is in the middle of the channel between Jersey and Sark. Gacquoil, standing at the helm, pointed out in turn the Grève-de-Leeq, Gros-Nez, and Plémont, and slipped the corvette along among this chain of reefs, feeling his way to a certain extent, but with certitude, like a man familiar with the course and acquainted with the moods of the sea. The corvette had no light forward, from a fear of betraying its passage through these guarded waters. The fog was a cause for rejoicing. They reached the Grande-Étape; the mist was so thick that they could scarcely make out the tall outline of the Pinnacle. Ten o'clock was heard to sound from the belfry of Saint-Ouen, a proof that the wind was still aft. All was yet going well; the sea grew rougher on account of the neighborhood of La Corbière.

A little after ten, the Comte du Boisberthelot and the Chevalier de La Vieuville reconducted the man in the peasant's garb to his cabin, which was in reality the captain's state-room. As he went in, he said to them in a low voice:

"You understand, messieurs, the importance of secrecy. Silence up to the moment of explosion. You two are the only ones here who know my name."

"We will carry it with us to the tomb," replied Boisberthelot.

"As for me," said the old man, "were I in the face of death, I would not tell it."

He entered his cabin.

III.

NOBLES AND PLEBEIANS MIXED

The commander and the second officer returned on deck and walked up and down, side by side, in conversation. They were evidently talking of their passenger, and this was the dialogue which the wind dispersed among the shadows.

Boisberthelot grumbled in a half-voice in the ear of La Vieuville:

"We shall see if he is really a leader."

La Vieuville replied:

"In the meantime, he is a prince."

"Almost."

"Nobleman in France, but prince in Brittany."

"Like the La Trémoilles, like the Rohans."

"With whom he is connected."

Boisberthelot resumed:

"In France and in the carriages of the king, he is a marquis as I am a count and you are a chevalier."

"The carriages are far away!" cried La Vieuville. "We have got to the tumbril."

There was a silence.

Boisberthelot began again: "For lack of a French prince, a Breton one is taken."

"For lack of thrushes—No, for want of an eagle, a crow is taken."

"I should prefer a vulture," said Boisberthelot.

And La Vieuville retorted:

"Yes, indeed! a beak and talons."

"We shall see."

"Yes," resumed La Vieuville, "it is time there was a head. I am of Tinteniac's opinion: 'A true chief, and gunpowder!' See, commander; I know nearly all the leaders, possible and impossible; those of yesterday, those of to-day, and those of to-morrow; there is not one with the sort of head-piece we need. In that accursed Vendée it wants a general who is at the same time a lawyer; he must worry the enemy, dispute with him every mill, thicket, ditch, pebble, quarrel with him, take advantage of everything, see to everything, slaughter plentifully, make examples, be sleepless and pitiless. At this hour in that army of peasants, there are heroes, there are no captains. D'Elbée is nothing, Lescure is ill, Bonchamps shows mercy; he is kind, that means stupid. La Rochejacquelein is a magnificent sub-lieutenant; Silz is an officer for open country, unfit for a war of tricks; Cathelineau is a simple carter; Stofflet is a cunning gamekeeper; Bérard is foolish, Boulainvilliers is ridiculous, Charette is shocking. And I do not speak of the barber Gaston. For, in the name of Mars, what is the good of opposing the Revolution, and what is the difference between the republicans and ourselves, if we set hairdressers to command noblemen?"

"You see that beast of a Revolution has infected us also."

"An itch that France has caught!"

"An itch of the Third Estate," replied Boisberthelot. "It is only England that can cure us of it."

"She will cure us, do not doubt it, captain."

"In the meanwhile, it is ugly."

"Indeed, clowns everywhere; the monarchy which has Stofflet for commander-in-chief and M. de Maulevrier for lieutenant, has nothing to envy in the republic that has for minister Pache, son of the Duke de Castries'. porter. What men this Vendean war brings out against each other; on one side Santerre the brewer, on the other Gaston the wig-maker!"

"My dear Vieuville, I have a certain respect for this Gaston. He did not conduct himself ill in his command of Guéménée. He very neatly shot three hundred Blues, after making them dig their own graves."

"Well and good, but I could have done that as well as he."

"Zounds, no doubt. And I also."

"The great acts of war," resumed La Vieuville, "require to be undertaken by noblemen. They are matters for knights and not for hairdressers."

"Still there are some estimable men among this 'Third Estate,'" returned Boisberthelot. "Take, for example, Joly the clockmaker. He had been a sergeant in a Flanders regiment, he gets himself made a Vendean chief, he commands a coast band, he has a son, who is a Republican, and, while the father serves among the Whites, the son serves among the Blues. Encounter. Battle. The father takes the son prisoner, and blows out his brains."

"He's a good one," said La Vieuville.

"A royalist Brutus," replied Boisberthelot.

"All that does not alter the fact that it is insupportable to be commanded by a Coquereau, a Jean-Jean, a Moulins, a Focart, a Bouju, a Chouppes!"

"My dear chevalier, the other side is equally disgusted. We are full of plebeians; they are full of nobles. Do you suppose the sans-culottes are content to be commanded by the Comte de Canclaux, the Vicomte de Miranda, the Vicomte de Beauharnais, the Comte de Valence, the Marquis de Custine, and the Duc de Biron!"

"What a hash!"

"And the Duc de Chartres!"

"Son of Egalité. Ah, then, when will he be king, that one?"

"Never."

"He mounts toward the throne. He is aided by his crimes."

"And held back by his vices," said Boisberthelot.

There was silence again, and Boisberthelot continued:

"Still he tried to bring about a reconciliation. He went to see the king. I was at Versailles when somebody spat on his back."

"From the top of the grand staircase?"

"Yes."

"It was well done."

"We call him Bourbon the Bourbeux."

"He is bald, he has pimples, he is a regicide, phew!"

And La Vieuville added:

"I was at Onessant with him."

"On the Saint-Esprit?"

"Yes."

"If he had obeyed the signal to keep to windward, that Admiral d'Orvilliers made him, he would have kept the English from passing."

"Certainly."

"Is it true that he was hidden at the bottom of the hold?"

"No. But it must be said all the same."

And La Vieuville burst out laughing.

Boisberthelot continued:

"There are idiots enough. For instance, that Boulainvilliers you were speaking of, La Vieuville, I knew him, I had a chance of studying him. In the beginning, the peasants were armed with pikes; did he not get it into his head to make pikemen of them? He wanted to teach them the manual of exercise, 'la pique-en-biais et la pique-trainante-le-fer-devant.' He dreamed of transforming those savages into soldiers of the line. He proposed to show them how to weaken a battalion and how to form hollow squares. He jabbered the old-fashioned military dialect to them; for the chief of a squad, he said un cap d'escade, which was the title of corporals under Louis XIV. He persisted in forming a regiment of those poachers; he had regular companies, and the sergeants ranged themselves in a circle every evening, receiving the sign and countersign from the colonel's sergeant, who whispered it to the sergeant of the lieutenants, he repeated it to his neighbor, and he to the man nearest, and so on, from ear to ear, down to the last. He cashiered an officer because he did not stand bareheaded to receive the watchword from the mouth of the sergeant. You can fancy how that succeeded. The booby could not understand that peasants must be led peasant fashion, and that one cannot make drilled soldiers out of woodchoppers. Yes, I knew that Boulainvilliers."

They moved on a few steps, each pursuing his own thoughts.

Then the conversation was renewed.

"By the way, is it certain that Dampierre is killed?"

"Yes, commander."

"Before Condé?"

"At the camp of Pamars. By a cannon ball."

Boisberthelot sighed.

"The Comte de Dampierre. Yet another of ours who went over to them!"

"A good journey to him," said La Vieuville.

"And Mesdames?—where are they?"

"At Trieste."

"Still?"

"Still."

And La Vieuville cried:

"Ah! this republic! what havoc from such slight consequences! When one thinks that this Revolution was caused by the deficit of a few millions!"

"Distrust small beginnings," said Boisberthelot.

"Everything is going badly," resumed La Vieuville.

"Yes, La Rouarie is dead, Du Dresnay is an idiot. What a poor lot all those bishops are, that Coucy, Bishop of Rochelle, that Beaupoil Saint-Aulaire, Bishop of Poitiers, that Mercy, Bishop of Luçon and lover of Madame de l'Eschasserie! . . . . "

"Whose name is Servanteau, you know, commander; L'Eschasserie is the name of an estate."

"And that false Bishop of Agra, who is curé of I know not what."

"Of Dol. He is called Guillot de Folleville. He is brave, at least, and fights."

"Priests when soldiers are needed! Bishops who are not bishops! Generals who are no generals!"

La Vieuville interrupted Boisberthelot.

"Commander, have you the Moniteur in your cabin?"

"Yes."

"What are they playing in Paris just now?"

"Adèle et Paulin, and La Caverne."

"I should like to see that."

"You will be able to. We shall be at Paris in a month."

Boisberthelot reflected a moment, and added:

"At the latest. Mr. Windham said so to Lord Hood."

"But then, captain, everything is not going so ill."

"Zounds! everything would go well, if the war in Brittany were properly conducted."

La Vieuville shook his head.

"Commander," asked he, "do we land the marines?"

"Yes; if the coast is for us; no, if it is against us. Sometimes war must break down doors, sometimes it must slip in quietly. Civil war ought always to have a false key in its pocket. We shall do all in our power. The most important is the chief."

Then Boisberthelot added thoughtfully:

"La Vieuville, what do you think of the Chevalier de Dieuzie?"

"The younger?"

"Yes."

"For a leader?"

"Yes."

"That he is another officer for open country and pitched battles. Only the peasant understands the thickets."

"Then resign yourself to General Stofflet and to General Cathelineau."

La Vieuville mused awhile, and then said: "It needs a prince, a prince of France, a prince of the blood. A true prince."

"Why? Whoever says prince . . . . "

"Says poltroon. I know it, commander. But one is needed for the effect on the big stupid eyes of the country lads."

"My dear chevalier, the princes will not come."

"We will get on without them."

Boisberthelot pressed his hand upon his forehead with the mechanical movement of a man endeavoring to bring out some idea.

He exclaimed:

"Well, let us try the general we have here."

"He is a great nobleman."

"Do you believe he will answer?"

"Provided he is strong."

"That is to say, ferocious," said Boisberthelot.

The count and the chevalier looked fixedly at one another.

"Monsieur du Boisberthelot, you have said the word. Ferocious. Yes, that is what we need. This is a war without pity. The hour is to the bloodthirsty. The regicides have cut off the head of Louis XVI.—we will tear off the four limbs of the regicides. Yes, the general necessary is General Inexorable. In Anjou and Upper Poitou the chiefs do the magnanimous, they dabble in generosity, nothing moves on. In the Marais and the country of Retz, the chiefs are ferocious—everything goes forward. It is because Charette is savage that he holds his own against Parrein. Hyena against hyena."

Boisberthelot had no time to reply to La Vieuville. La Vieuville's words were suddenly cut short by a desperate cry, and at the same instant they heard a noise as unaccountable as it was awful. The cry and this noise came from the interior of the vessel.

The captain and lieutenant made a rush for the gun-deck, but could not get down. All the gunners were frantically hurrying up.

A frightful thing had just happened.

IV.

TORMENTUM BELLI

One of the carronades of the battery, a twenty-four-pounder, had got loose.

This is perhaps the most formidable of ocean accidents. Nothing more terrible can happen to a ship of war at sea and under full sail.

A gun that breaks its moorings becomes suddenly some indescribable supernatural beast. It is a machine which transforms itself into a monster. This mass turns upon its wheels, has the rapid movements of a billiard-ball, rolls with the rolling, pitches with the pitching, goes, comes, pauses, seems to meditate, resumes its course, rushes from end to end along the ship like an arrow, circles about, springs aside, evades, roars, breaks, kills, exterminates. It is a battering-ram which assaults a wall at its own caprice. Moreover: the battering-ram is metal, the wall wood. It is the entrance of matter into liberty; one might say that this eternal slave avenges itself; it seems as if the power of evil hidden in what we call inanimate objects finds a vent and bursts out suddenly; it has an air of having lost patience, of seeking some fierce, obscure retribution; nothing more inexorable than this rage of the inanimate. The mad mass has the bounds of a panther, the weight of the elephant, the agility of the mouse, the obstinacy of the axe, the unexpectedness of the wave, the rapidity of lightning, the deafness of the tomb. It weighs ten thousand pounds, and it rebounds like a child's ball. Its flight is a wild whirl abruptly cut at right angles. What is to be done? How to end this? A tempest ceases, a wind falls, a broken mast is replaced, a leak is stopped, a fire dies out; but how to control this enormous brute of bronze? In what way can one attack it? You can make a mastiff hear reason, astonish a bull, fascinate a boa, frighten a tiger, soften a lion; there is no resource with that monster, a cannon let loose. You cannot kill it, it is dead, and at the same time, it lives. It lives with a sinister life bestowed upon it by Infinity. The planks beneath it give it play. It is moved by the ship, which is moved by the sea, which is moved by the wind. This destroyer is a plaything. The ship, the waves, the blasts, all aid it; hence its frightful vitality. How assail this fury of complication?

How fetter this monstrous mechanism for wrecking a ship? How foresee its comings and goings, its returns, its stops, its shocks? Any one of these blows upon the sides may stave out the vessel. How divine its awful gyrations! One has to deal with a projectile which thinks, which seems to possess ideas, and which changes its direction at each instant. How stop the course of something which must be avoided? The horrible cannon flings itself about, advances, recoils, strikes to the right, strikes to the left, flees, passes, disconcerts ambushes, breaks down obstacles, crushes men like flies. The great danger of the situation is in the mobility of its base. How combat an inclined plane which has caprices? The ship has, so to speak, lightning imprisoned in its womb which seeks to escape; something like thunder rolling above an earthquake.

In an instant the whole crew were on foot. The fault was the gunner's, who had neglected to tighten the screw-nut of the mooring-chain and had badly shackled the four wheels of the carronade; this had given play to the sole and frame, separated the platform, and had ended by breaking the breeching. The cordage had broken, so that the gun was no longer secure on the carriage. The stationary breeching, which prevents recoil, was not in use at that period. As a heavy wave struck the port, the carronade, badly fastened, had recoiled and burst its chain, and began to rush wildly about between decks.

Conceive, in order to have an idea of this strange sliding, a drop of water running down a pane of glass.

At the moment when the lashings gave way the gunners were in the battery. Some in groups, others standing alone, occupied with such duties as sailors perform in expectation of the command to clear for action. The carronade, hurled forward by the pitching, dashed into this knot of men, and crushed four at the first blow, then, flung back and shot out anew by the rolling, it cut in two a fifth poor fellow, glanced off to the larboard side, and struck a piece of the battery with such force as to unship it. Then rose the cry of distress which had been heard. The men rushed toward the ladder—the gun-deck emptied in the twinkling of an eye.

The enormous cannon was left alone. She was given up to herself. She was her own mistress, and mistress of the vessel. She could do what she willed with both. This whole crew, accustomed to laugh in battle, trembled now. To describe the universal terror would be impossible.

Captain Boisberthelot and Lieutenant

Vieuville, although both brave men, stopped at the top of the gangway stairs, and, mute, pale, hesitating, looked down on the gun-deck. Some one pushed them aside with his elbow and descended.

It was their passenger, the peasant, the man of whom they had been speaking a moment before.

When he reached the foot of the ladder, he stood still.

V.

VIS ET VIR

The cannon came and went along the deck. One might have fancied it the living chariot of the Apocalypse. The marine-lantern swinging overhead, added a dizzying whirl of lights and shadows to this vision. The shape of the cannon was undistinguishable from the rapidity of its course, now looking black in the light, now casting weird reflections through the gloom.

It continued its work of destroying the ship. It had already shattered four other pieces, and dug two holes in the side, fortunately above the water-line, though they would leak in case a squall should come on. It dashed itself frantically against the framework; the solid ribs resisted—bent woods have great strength; but they creaked under the assaults of this terrible club, striking, with a sort of appalling ubiquity, on every side at once. The strokes of a bullet shaken in a bottle would not be madder or more rapid.

The four wheels passed and repassed above the dead men, cut, carved, slashed them, till the five corpses were a score of stumps rolling about the deck; the heads seemed to cry out; streams of blood twisted in and out of the planks with every pitch of the vessel. The planking, damaged in several places, began to gape. The whole ship was filled with the awful tumult.

The captain had quickly recovered his composure, and at his order the sailors threw down into the deck everything which could deaden and check the mad rush of the gun, mattresses, hammocks, spare sails, coils of rope, extra equipments, and the bales of false assignats of which the corvette carried a whole cargo; this infamous English deception being considered a fair trick in war.

But what could these rags avail, no one daring to descend to arrange them in any useful fashion? In a few minutes they were mere heaps of lint.

There was just sea enough to render the accident as complete as possible. A tempest would have been desirable; it might, perhaps, have overthrown the gun, and, the four wheels once in the air, the monster could have been mastered.

But the devastation increased. There were gashes and even fractures in the masts, which, imbedded in the wood-work of the keel, pierce the decks of ships like great round pillars. Under the convulsive blows of the gun the mizzen-mast was cracked, the main-mast itself was injured. The battery was being destroyed. Ten pieces out of the thirty were disabled; the breaches multiplied in the side, and the corvette began to take in water.

The old passenger, who had descended to the gun-deck, looked like a form of stone stationed at the foot of the stairs. He gazed sternly about upon the devastation. He stood motionless. It seemed impossible to take a single step forward.

Each bound of the liberated carronade threatened the destruction of the vessel. A few minutes more and shipwreck would be inevitable.

They must perish or put a summary end to the disaster; a decision must be made; but how?

What a combatant—this cannon!

They must check this mad monster.

They must seize this flash of lightning.

They must overthrow this thunderbolt.

Boisberthelot said to La Vieuville:

"Do you believe in God, chevalier?"

La Vieuville replied:

"Yes. No. Sometimes."

"In a tempest?"

"Yes; and in moments like this."

"Truly, only God can aid us here," said Boisberthelot.

All were silent, the cannon kept up its horrible din.

Outside, the waves beating against the ship responded to the strokes of the cannon. It was like two hammers alternating.

Suddenly, into the midst of this sort of inaccessible circus where the escaped cannon leaped and bounded, they saw a man appear, an iron bar in his hand. It was the author of this catastrophe, the gunner whose culpable negligence had caused the accident, the captain of the gun. Having been the means of bringing about the misfortune, he desired to repair it. He had caught up a handspike in one hand, a truss, with a slipping noose in the other, and jumped down into the gun-deck.

Then a strange combat began; a titanic spectacle, the struggle of the gun against the gunner; a battle between matter and intelligence, a duel between the inanimate and the human.

The man was posted in an angle, and, his bar and rope in his two hands, backed against one of the ribs, settled firmly on his legs as on two pillars of steel, livid, calm, tragic, rooted as it were in the planks, he waited.

He waited for the cannon to pass near him.

The gunner knew his piece, and it seemed to him that she must recognize him. He had lived a long while with her. How many times he had thrust his hand into her throat! It was his tame monster. He began to address it as he might have done his dog. "Come," said he. Perhaps he loved it.

He seemed to wish that it would come toward him.

But to come toward him, that would be to spring upon him. And then he was lost. How to avoid its crush? There was the question. All stared, terrified. Not a breast respired freely, except perhaps that of the old man who alone stood on the gun-deck with the two combatants, a stern second.

He might himself be crushed by the piece. He did not stir.

Beneath them, the blind sea directed the battle.

At the instant when, accepting this awful hand-to-hand contest, the gunner approached to challenge the cannon, some chance fluctuation of the waves kept it for a moment immovable, as if stupefied. "Come on!" the man said to it. It seemed to listen.

Suddenly it darted upon him. The man avoided the shock.

The struggle began. An unheard-of struggle. The fragile matching itself against the invulnerable. The thing of flesh attacking the brute of brass. On the one side force, on the other a soul.

The whole scene passed in a half-light. It was like the indistinct vision of a miracle.

A soul, a strange thing, you would have said that the cannon had one also; but a soul filled with rage and hatred. This blindness seemed to have eyes. The monster appeared to be watching the man. There was, at least one might have fancied so, cunning in this mass. It also chose its moment. It was an immense unknown insect of metal having, or seeming to have, the will of a demon. Sometimes this colossal grasshopper would strike the low ceiling of the gun-deck, then fall back on its four wheels like a tiger upon its four paws, and dart anew on the man. He, supple, agile, adroit, would glide away like a snake from the reach of these lightning-like movements. He avoided the encounters, but the blows which he escaped fell upon the vessel and continued the havoc.

A piece of broken chain remained attached to the carronade. This chain had twisted itself, one could not tell how, about the screw of the breech-button. One end of the chain was fastened to the carriage. The other, hanging loose, whirled wildly about the gun and added to the danger of its blows. The screw held it like a clenched hand, and this chain, multiplying the strokes of the battering-ram by its strokes of a thong, made a fearful whirlwind about the cannon, a whip of iron in a fist of brass. This chain complicated the battle.

Nevertheless, the man fought. Sometimes, even, it was the man who attacked the cannon; he crept along the side, bar and rope in hand; and the cannon seemed to understand, and, as if it perceived a snare, fled. The man, formidable, pursued it.

Such things cannot last long. The gun seemed suddenly to say to itself: "Come! we must make an end!" and it paused. One felt the approach of the crisis. The cannon, as if in suspense, appeared to have, or had, for to all it seemed a sentient being, a furious premeditation. Without warning, it sprang upon the gunner. The gunner jumped aside, let it pass, and cried out with a laugh: "Try again!" The gun, as if in a rage, broke a carronade to larboard; then, seized anew by the invisible sling which held it, was flung to starboard toward the man, who escaped. Three carronades gave way under the blows of the gun; then, as if blind and no longer conscious of what it was doing, it turned its back on the man, rolled from the stern to the bow, breaking the stem and making a breach in the forward planking. The man had taken refuge at the foot of the stairs, a few steps from the old man, who was watching. The gunner held his handspike in rest. The cannon seemed to perceive him, and, without taking the trouble to turn itself, backed upon him with the quickness of an axe-stroke. The gunner, if driven back against the side, was lost. The crew uttered a simultaneous cry.

But the old passenger, until now immovable, made a spring more rapid than all those wild whirls. He seized a bale of the false assignats, and, at the risk of being crushed, succeeded in flinging it between the wheels of the carronade. This manœuvre, decisive and dangerous, could not have been executed with more adroitness and precision by a man trained to all the exercises set down in Durosel's "Manual of Sea Gunnery."

The bale had the effect of a plug. A pebble may stop a log, a tree-branch turn an avalanche. The carronade stumbled. The gunner, in his turn, seizing this terrible chance, plunged his iron bar between the spokes of one of the hind wheels. The cannon was stopped.

It staggered. The man, using the bar as a lever, rocked it to and fro. The heavy mass turned over with a clang like a falling bell, and the gunner, dripping with sweat, rushed headlong forward and passed the slipping noose of the truss about the bronze neck of the overthrown monster.

It was ended. The man had conquered. The ant had subdued the mastodon; the pigmy had taken the thunderbolt prisoner.

The marines and the sailors clapped their hands.

The whole crew hurried down with cables and chains, and in an instant the cannon was securely lashed.

The gunner saluted the passenger.

"Monsieur," said he to him, "you have saved my life."

The old man had resumed his impassible attitude, and did not reply.

VI.

THE TWO ENDS OF THE SCALE

The man had conquered, but one might say that the cannon had also conquered. Immediate shipwreck had been avoided, but the corvette was by no means saved. The injury to the vessel seemed irremediable. The sides had five breaches, one of which, very large, was in the bow; out of the thirty carronades, twenty lay useless in their carriages. The carronade, which had been captured and rechained, was itself disabled; the screw of the breech-button was broken, and the leveling of the piece in consequence impossible. The battery was reduced to nine pieces. The hold had sprung a leak. It was necessary at once to repair the damages and set the pumps to work.

The gun-deck, now that one had time to look about it, offered a terrible spectacle. The interior of a mad elephant's cage could not have been more completely dismantled.

However great the necessity that the corvette should escape observation, a still more imperious necessity presented itself, immediate safety. It had been necessary to light up the deck by lanterns placed here and there along the sides.

But during the whole time this tragic diversion had lasted, the crew being so absorbed by the one question of life or death, had noticed little of what was passing outside the scene of the duel. The fog had thickened; the weather had changed; the wind had driven the vessel at will; they had got out of their course, in plain sight of Jersey and Guernsey, farther to the south than they ought to have gone; they found themselves in rough water. Great waves kissed the gaping wounds of the corvette, kisses full of peril. The sea rocked her menacingly. The breeze was becoming a gale. A squall, a storm perhaps, threatened. It was impossible to see more than four oars' length ahead.

While the crew were repairing summarily and in haste the ravages of the gun-deck, stopping the leaks and putting back into position the guns which had escaped the disaster, the old passenger had gone on deck.

He stood with his back against the mainmast.

He had paid no attention to a proceeding which had taken place on the vessel. The Chevalier de La Vieuville had drawn up the marines in line on either side of the mainmast, and, at the whistle of the boatswain, the sailors busy in the rigging stood upright on the yards.

The Comte du Boisberthelot advanced toward the passenger.

Behind the captain marched a man haggard, breathless, his clothes in disorder, yet wearing a satisfied look.

It was the gunner who had just now so opportunely shown himself a tamer of monsters, and who had got the better of the cannon.

The count made a military salute to the unknown in peasant garb, and said to him:

"General, here is the man."

The gunner held himself erect, his eyes downcast, standing in a soldierly attitude.

The Comte du Boisberthelot continued:

"General, taking into consideration what this man has done, do you not think there is something for his commanders to do?"

"I think there is," said the old man.

"Be good enough to give the orders," returned Boisberthelot.

"It is for you to give them. You are the captain."

"But you are the general," answered Boisberthelot.

The old man looked at the gunner.

"Approach," said he.

The gunner moved forward a step.

The old man turned toward the Comte du Boisberthelot, detached the cross of Saint-Louis from the captain's uniform and fastened it on the jacket of the gunner.

"Hurrah!" cried the sailors.

The marines presented arms.

And the old passenger, pointing with his finger toward the bewildered gunner, added:

"Now, let that man be shot."

Stupor succeeded the applause.

Then, in the midst of a silence like that of the tomb, the old man raised his voice. He said:

"A negligence has endangered this ship. At this moment she is perhaps lost. To be at sea is to face the enemy. A vessel at sea is an army which gives battle. The tempest conceals, but does not absent itself. The whole sea is an ambuscade. Death is the penalty of any fault committed in the face of the enemy. No fault is reparable. Courage ought to be rewarded and negligence punished."

These words fell one after the other, slowly, solemnly, with a sort of inexorable measure, like the blows of an axe upon an oak.

And the old man, turning to the soldiers, added:

"Do your duty."

The man upon whose breast shone the cross of Saint-Louis bowed his head.

At a sign from the Comte du Boisberthelot, two sailors descended between decks, then returned, bringing the hammock winding-sheet; the ship's chaplain, who since the time of sailing had been at prayer in the officers' quarters, accompanied the two sailors; a sergeant detached from the line twelve marines, who formed in two ranks, six by six; the gunner, without uttering a word, placed himself between the two files. The chaplain, crucifix in hand, advanced and stood near him. "March!" said the sergeant. The platoon moved with slow steps towards the bow; the two sailors, carrying the shroud, followed. A gloomy silence fell upon the corvette. A hurricane moaned in the distance.

A few instants later, a report was heard echoing among the shadows, a flash passed, then all was silent, and they heard the thud of a body falling into the sea.

The old passenger, still leaning back against the main-mast, had folded his arms, and seemed to be thinking.

Boisberthelot, pointing toward him with the forefinger of his left hand, said in a low voice to La Vieuville:

"The Vendée has found a head!"

VII.

HE WHO SETS SAIL ENTERS INTO A LOTTERY

But what was to become of the corvette?

The clouds, which the whole night through had touched the waves, now lowered so thickly that the horizon was no longer visible, and the whole sea seemed to be covered with a pall. Nothing to be seen but fog. A situation always perilous, even for a vessel in good condition.

Added to the mist there was the rising sea.

The time had been used to good purpose; the corvette had been lightened by throwing overboard everything which could be cleared away of the havoc made by the carronade, the dismantled guns, the broken carriages, frames twisted or started, the fragments of broken wood and iron; the port-holes had been opened, and the corpses and parts of bodies, sewn up in tarpaulin, were slid down planks into the waves.

The sea was becoming worse. Not that the storm was near; it seemed on the contrary that the moaning of the hurricane behind the horizon decreased, and the squall was moving northward; but the waves were still very high which indicated disturbance in the depths, and in her crippled condition, the corvette could offer but little resistance to shocks, so that the large waves might prove fatal to her.

Gacquoil stood thoughtfully at the helm.

To face ill-fortune with a bold front is the habit of those accustomed to rule at sea.

La Vieuville, who was the sort of man that becomes gay in the midst of disaster, spoke to Gacquoil.

"Well, pilot," said he, "the squall has missed fire. Its attempt at sneezing comes to nothing. We shall get out of it. We shall have wind. That is all."

Gacquoil gravely replied:

"Where there is wind there are waves."

Neither laughing, nor sad, such is the sailor. The response had a disquieting significance. For a leaky ship to encounter a high sea is to fill rapidly. Gacquoil emphasized his assertion by a frown. Perhaps La Vieuville had spoken, a little too soon after the catastrophe of the gun and its gunner, words almost jovial and gay. There are things which bring bad luck at sea. The ocean is unreliable; one never knows what it means to do. It is necessary to be always on guard against it.

La Vieuville felt the necessity of getting back to gravity.

"Where are we, pilot?" asked he.

The pilot replied:

"We are in the hands of God."

A pilot is a master; he must always be allowed to do what he wishes, and often he must be allowed to say what he pleases. Generally this sort of man speaks little. La Vieuville moved away.

La Vieuville had asked a question of the pilot, it was the horizon which replied.

The sea suddenly cleared.

The fog which trailed across the waves suddenly lifted; all the dark confusion of the billows spread out to the edge of the horizon in a shadowy half-light, and this was what became visible.

The sky seemed covered with a lid of clouds; but they no longer touched the water; in the east appeared a whiteness which was the dawn, in the west trembled a corresponding whiteness, which was the setting moon. These two whitenesses formed, opposite each other, two narrow bands of pale light along the horizon between the black sea and the gloomy sky.

Across each of these lines of light were sketched black profiles, upright and immovable.

To the west, against the moonlit sky, stood out sharply three lofty rocks, erect as Celtic cromlechs.

To the east, against the pale horizon of morning, rose eight sail ranged in order at regular intervals in a formidable array.

The three rocks were a reef; the eight ships were a squadron.

Behind the corvette was the Minquiers, a rock of an evil renown, before her, the French cruisers. To the west, the abyss, to the east, carnage; she was between a shipwreck and a battle.

For meeting the reef, the corvette had a weakened hull, broken rigging, masts tottering in their steps; for facing battle, she had a battery where twenty-one cannon out of thirty were dismounted, and whose best gunners were dead.

The dawn was yet faint, and there still remained to them a little night. This night might even last for some time, since it was principally made by high clouds, thick and black, presenting the solid appearance of a vault.

The wind, which had succeeded in dispersing the lower mists, was forcing the corvette toward the Minquiers.

In her great feebleness and dilapidation, she scarcely obeyed the helm, she rolled rather than sailed, and, borne on by the waves, she yielded passively to their impulse.

The Minquiers, a dangerous reef, was still more rugged at that time than it is now. Several towers of this citadel of the abyss have been razed by the incessant chopping of the sea; the configuration of reefs changes; it is not idly that waves are called the swords of the ocean, each tide is the stroke of a saw. In those days, to strike on the Minquiers was to perish.

As for the cruisers, they were the squadron of Cancale, afterward so celebrated under the command of that Captain Duchesne whom Léquinio called "Father Duchêne."

The situation was critical. During the struggle of the unchained carronade, the corvette had, unobserved, got out of her course, and sailed rather toward Granville than toward Saint-Malo. Even if she had been in a condition to have been handled and to carry sail, the Minquiers would have barred her return toward Jersey, and the cruisers would have prevented her reaching France.

For the rest, storm there was none. But, as the pilot had said, there were waves. The sea, rolling under a rough wind and above a rocky bottom, was savage.

The sea never says at once what it wishes. The gulf hides everything, even trickery. One might almost say that the sea has a plan, it advances and recoils; it proposes and contradicts itself, it sketches a storm and renounces its design, it promises the abyss, and does not hold to it; it threatens the north and strikes the south. All night the corvette La Claymore had had the fog and the fear of the storm; the sea had belied itself, but in a terrible way; it had sketched in the storm, but developed the reef. It was shipwreck nevertheless, under another form.

So that to destruction upon the rocks was added extermination by fighting. One enemy complementing the other.

La Vieuville cried amid his brave merriment:

"Shipwreck here, battle there! We have thrown double-fives."

VIII.

9 = 380

The corvette was little more than a wreck.

In the wan, dim light, in the blackness of the clouds, in the confused, changing line of the horizon, in the mysterious sullenness of the waves, there was a sepulchral solemnity. Except for the hissing breath of the hostile wind, all was silent. The catastrophe rose with majesty from the gulf. It resembled rather an apparition than an attack. Nothing stirred among the rocks, nothing moved on the vessels. It was an indescribable, colossal silence. Had they to deal with something real? One might have believed it a dream sweeping across the sea. There are legends of such visions; the corvette was in a manner between the demon reef and the phantom fleet.

The Comte du Boisberthelot gave orders in a low voice to La Vieuville who descended to the gun-deck, then the captain took his telescope and stationed himself at the stern by the side of the pilot.

Gacquoil's whole effort was to keep the corvette to the wind; for, if struck on the side by the wind and the sea, she would inevitably capsize.

"Pilot," said the captain, "where are we?"

"Off the Minquiers."

"On which side?"

"The bad one."

"What bottom?"

"Small rocks."

"Can we bring her broadside on?"

"We can always die," said the pilot.

The captain leveled his glass toward the west and examined the Minquiers; then he turned to the east and studied the sail in sight.

The pilot continued, as if talking to himself:

"It is the Minquiers. It is where the laughing sea-mew and the great black-hooded gull rest, when they make for Holland."

In the meantime the captain counted the sail.

There were, indeed, eight vessels, drawn up in line, and lifting their warlike profiles above the water. In the centre was seen the lofty sweep of a three-decker.

The captain questioned the pilot.

"Do you know those ships?"

"Yes, indeed!" replied Gacquoil.

"What are they?"

"It is the squadron."

"Of France?"

"Of the devil."

There was a silence. The captain resumed: "The whole body of cruisers are there."

"Not all."

In fact, on the 2d of April, Valazé had announced to the Convention that ten frigates and six ships of the line were cruising in the Channel. The recollection of this came to the captain.

"Right," said he, "the squadron consists of sixteen vessels. There are only eight here."

"The rest," said Gacquoil, "are lagging below, the whole length of the coast, and on the look-out."

The captain, still with his glass to his eye, murmured:

"A three-decker, two first-class frigates, and five second-class."

"But I, too," growled Gacquoil, "have marked them out."

"Good vessels," said the captain; "I have done something myself toward commanding them."

"As for me," said Gacquoil, "I have seen them close by. I do not mistake one for the other. I have their description in my head."

The captain handed his telescope to the pilot.

"Pilot, can you make out the three-decker clearly?"

"Yes, commander, it is La Côte-d'Or."

"Which they have rebaptized," said the captain. "She was formerly Les États-de-Bourgogne. A new vessel. One hundred and twenty-eight guns."

He took a pencil and note-book from his pocket, and wrote the number 128 on one of the leaves.

He continued:

"Pilot, what is the first sail to larboard?"

"It is the L'Expérimentée."

"First-class frigate, fifty-two guns. She was fitted out at Brest two months ago."

The captain wrote the number on his note-book.

"Pilot," asked he, "what is the second sail to larboard?"

"La Dryade."

"First-class frigate. Forty eighteen-pounders. She has been in India. She has a good reputation."

And beneath the 52 he put the number 40; then lifting his head:

"Now to starboard."

"Commander, those are all second-class frigates. There are five of them."

"Which is the first, starting from the ship?"

"La Résolute."

"Thirty-two pieces of eighteen. And the second?"

"Le Richemont."

"Same. The next?"

"L'Athée."

"Odd name to take to sea. What next?"

"La Calypso."

"And then?"

"La Preneuse."

"Five frigates, each of thirty-two guns."

The captain wrote 160 below the first figures.

"Pilot," said he, "you recognize them perfectly."

"And you," replied Gacquoil, "you know them well, captain. To recognize is something, to know is better."

The captain had his eyes fixed on his note-book and added between his teeth:

"One hundred and twenty-eight, fifty-two, forty, one hundred and sixty."

At this moment, La Vieuville came on deck again.

"Chevalier," cried the captain to him, "we are in sight of three hundred and eighty guns."

"So be it," said La Vieuville.

"You come from the inspection, La Vieuville; how many guns, exactly, have we fit for firing?"

"Nine."

"So be it," said Boisberthelot, in his turn.

He took the telescope from the pilot's hands and studied the horizon.

The eight vessels, silent and black, seemed motionless, but they grew larger.

They were approaching imperceptibly.

La Vieuville made a military salute. "Commander," said La Vieuville, "this is my report. I distrusted this corvette Claymore. It is always annoying to embark suddenly on a vessel that does not know you or that does not love you. English ship, traitor to Frenchmen. That slut of a carronade proved it. I have made the round. Anchors good. They are not made of half-finished iron; they are forged bars welded under the tilt-hammer. The flukes are solid. Cables excellent, easy to pay out, regulation length, a hundred and twenty fathoms. Plenty of ammunition. Six gunners dead. A hundred and seventy-one rounds apiece."

"Because there are but nine pieces left," murmured the captain.

Boisberthelot leveled his telescope with the horizon. The squadron was still slowly approaching.

The carronades possess one advantage, three men are enough to work them; but they have one inconvenience, they do not carry so far or aim so true as guns. It would be necessary to let the squadron get within range of the carronades.

The captain gave his orders in a low voice. There was silence throughout the vessel. No signal to clear for battle had been given, but it was done. The corvette was as much disabled for fighting with men as against the waves. Everything that was possible was done with this ruin of a war-vessel. By the gangway near the steering-gear were heaped all the hawsers and spare cables for strengthening the masts in case of need. Between decks was put in order for the wounded. According to the naval usage of that time, the deck was barricaded, which is a guaranty against balls, but not against bullets. The ball-gauges were brought, although it was a little late, to verify the calibres; but so many incidents had not been foreseen. Each sailor received a cartridge-box, and stuck into his belt a pair of pistols and a cutlass. The hammocks were stowed away; the guns run out; the musketry prepared; the axes and grapplings laid out; the cartridge and bullet stores made ready; and the powder-room opened. Every man was at his post. All was done without a word being spoken, like arrangements made in the chamber of a dying person. All was haste and gloom.

Then the corvette showed her broadside. She had six anchors, like a frigate. The whole six were let go; the cock-bill anchor forward, the kedge-anchor aft, the flood-anchor toward the open, the ebb-anchor on the side to the rocks, the bower-anchor to starboard, and the sheet-anchor to larboard.

The nine carronades still in condition were put into form; the whole nine on one side, that toward the enemy.

The squadron had, on its part, not less silently completed its manœuvres. The eight vessels now formed a bow of which the Minquiers made the string. The Claymore, inclosed in this semicircle, and into the bargain made fast by her anchors, was backed by the reef, that is to say, by shipwreck.

It was like a pack of hounds about a wild boar, not yet giving tongue, but showing their teeth.

It seemed as if on the one side and on the other they awaited some signal.

The gunners of La Claymore stood to their pieces.

Boisberthelot said to La Vieuville:

"I should like to open fire."

"A coquette's whim," replied La Vieuville.

IX.

SOME ONE ESCAPES

The passenger had not quitted the deck, he watched all, unmoved.

Boisberthelot approached.

"Monsieur," said he to him, "the preparations are complete. We are now lashed fast to our tomb, we shall not let go our hold. We are the prisoners of either the squadron or the reef. To yield to the enemy or founder among the rocks. We have no other choice. One resource remains to us, to die. It is better to fight than be wrecked. I would rather be shot than drowned; in the matter of death, I prefer fire to water. But dying is the business of the rest of us, it is not yours. You are the man chosen by the princes, you have a great mission, the direction of the war in the Vendée. Your loss is perhaps the monarchy lost; therefore you must live. Our honor bids us remain here, yours bids you go. General, you must leave the ship. I am going to give you a man and a boat. To reach the coast by a détour is not impossible. It is not yet daylight. The waves are high, the sea is dark; you will escape. There are cases when to fly is to conquer."

The old man bowed his stately head as a sign of acquiescence.

The Comte du Boisberthelot raised his voice.

"Soldiers and sailors!" cried he.

Every movement ceased, and, from every point of the vessel all faces turned toward the captain.

He continued:

"This man who is among us represents the king. He has been confided to us, we must save him. He is necessary to the throne of France; in default of a prince, he will be, at least such is our intention, the leader in the Vendée. He is a great general. He was to have landed in France with us, he must land without us. To save the head, is to save all."

"Yes! yes! yes!" cried the voices of the whole crew.

"He also is about to risk serious danger. It will not be easy to reach the coast. In order to face the angry sea, the boat should be large, and should be small in order to escape the cruisers. What must be done is to make land, at some safe point, and better toward Fougères than in the direction of Coutances. It needs an athletic sailor, a good oarsman and swimmer; who belongs to this coast, and who knows the Channel. There is night enough, so that the boat can leave the corvette without being perceived. And, besides, we are going to have smoke, which will serve to hide her. The boat's size will help her through the shallows. Where the panther is snared, the weasel escapes. There is no outlet for us, there is for him. The boat will row rapidly away; the enemy's ships will not see her; and moreover, during that time we are going to amuse them ourselves. Is it decided?"

"Yes! yes! yes!" cried the crew.

"There is not an instant to lose," pursued the captain. "Is there any man willing?"

A sailor stepped out of the ranks in the darkness, and said:

X.

DOES HE ESCAPE?

A few minutes later, one of those little boats called a "gig," and which are especially appropriated to the captain's service, pushed off from the vessel. There were two men in this boat,—the old passenger in the stern, and the sailor who was "willing," in the bow. The night still lingered. The sailor, in obedience to the captain's orders, rowed vigorously in the direction of the Minquiers. For that matter, no other way was possible.

Some provisions had been put into the boat, a bag of biscuit, a smoked ox-tongue, and a cask of water.

At the instant the gig was let down, La Vieuville, a scoffer even in the presence of destruction, leaned over the corvette's stern-post, and sneered this farewell to the boat:

"She is a good one if one want to escape, and an excellent one if one wish to drown."

"Monsieur," said the pilot, "let us laugh no longer."

The start was quickly made, and there was soon a considerable distance between the boat and the corvette. The wind and the waves were in the oarsman's favor, and the little bark fled swiftly, rising through the twilight, and hidden by the height of the waves.

The sea seemed to wear a look of sombre, indescribable expectation.

Suddenly, amid the vast and tumultuous silence of the ocean, arose a voice, which, increased by the speaking-trumpet as if by the brazen mask of antique tragedy, sounded almost superhuman.

It was the voice of Captain Boisberthelot giving his commands.

"Royal marines," cried he, "nail the white flag to the main-mast. We are about to see our last sunrise."

And the corvette fired its first shot.

"Long live the King!" shouted the crew.

Then from the horizon echoed an answering shout, immense, distant, confused, yet nevertheless distinct:

"Long live the Republic!"

And the din like the peal of three hundred thunderbolts burst over the depths of the sea.

The battle began.

The sea was covered with smoke and fire. Streams of foam, made by the falling bullets, whitened the waves on every side.

The Claymore began to spit flame on the eight vessels. At the same time the whole squadron, ranged in a half-moon about the corvette, opened fire from all its batteries. The horizon was in a blaze. A volcano seemed to have burst suddenly out of the sea. The wind twisted to and fro the vast crimson banner of battle, amid which the ships appeared and disappeared like phantoms. In front the black skeleton of the corvette showed against the red background.

The white banner, with its fleur-de-lis, could be seen floating from the main.

The two men seated in the little boat kept silence.

The triangular shallows of the Minquiers, a sort of submarine trinacrium, is larger than the entire island of Jersey; the sea covers it; it has for culminating point a platform, which even the highest tides do not reach, from whence six mighty rocks detach themselves toward the northeast, ranged in a straight line, and producing the effect of a great wall which has crumbled here and there. The strait between the plateau and the six reefs is only practicable to boats drawing very little water. Beyond this strait is the open sea.

The sailor who had undertaken the command of the boat made for this strait. By that means he put the Minquiers between the battle and the little bark. He passed the narrow channel skillfully, avoiding the reefs to larboard and starboard; the rocks now hid the conflict. The lurid light of the horizon and the awful uproar of the cannonading began to lessen as the distance increased; but, by the continuation of the firing, they knew that the corvette held firm and meant to exhaust, to the very last, her one hundred and seventy-one broadsides.

Presently the boat reached safe water, beyond the reef, beyond the battle, out of reach of the bullets.

Little by little the face of the sea became less dark, the rays against which the darkness struggled, widened, the foam burst into jets of light, the tops of the waves gave back white reflections. Day appeared.

The boat was out of danger as far as the enemy was concerned; but the most difficult part of the task remained. The boat was safe from grape-shot, but not from shipwreck. She was a mere egg-shell, in a high sea, without deck, without sail, without mast, without compass, having no resource but her oars, in the presence of the ocean and the hurricane, an atom at the mercy of giants.

Then, amid this immensity, this solitude, lifting his face which was lit up by the morning, the man in the bow of the boat looked fixedly at the one in the stern, and said:

"I am the brother of him you ordered to be shot."

BOOK THREE

HALMALO

I.

SPEECH IS "THE WORD"

The old man slowly raised his head.

He who had spoken was a man of about thirty. His forehead was brown with sea-tan; his eyes were peculiar; they combined the keen glance of a sailor with the open look of a peasant. He held the oars firmly in his hands. His air was mild.

In his belt were a dirk, two pistols, and a rosary.

"Who are you?" asked the old man.

"I have just told you."

"What do you want with me?"

The sailor shipped the oars, folded his arms, and replied:

"To kill you."

"As you please," said the old man.

The other raised his voice.

"Get ready."

"For what?"

"To die."

"Why?" asked the old man.

There was silence. The sailor seemed for an instant confused by the question. He repeated:

"I say that I mean to kill you."

"And I ask you why?"

The sailor's eyes flashed.

"Because you killed my brother."

The old man replied with perfect calmness:

"I began by saving his life."

"That is true. You first saved him, then you killed him."

"It was not I who killed him."

"Who, then, killed him?"

"His own fault."

The sailor stared, open-mouthed, at the old man; then his brows met again in their murderous frown.

"What is your name?" asked the old man.

"Halmalo, but you do not need to know my name in order to be killed by me."

At this moment the sun rose. A ray struck full upon the sailor's face and vividly lighted up that savage countenance. The old man studied it attentively.

The cannonading, though it still continued, was now broken and irregular. A vast cloud of smoke hung low on the horizon. The boat, no longer directed by the oarsman, drifted to leeward.

The sailor seized in his right hand one of the pistols at his belt, and the rosary in his left.

The old man raised himself to his full height.

"You believe in God?" said he.

"Our Father which art in heaven," replied the sailor. And he made the sign of the cross.

"Have you a mother?"

"Yes."

He made a second sign of the cross. Then he resumed:

"It is all said. I give you a minute, my lord." And he cocked the pistol.

"Why do you call me 'my lord?'"

"Because you are a lord. That is plain enough to be seen."

"Have you a lord—you?"

"Yes. And a grand one. Does one live without a lord?"

"Where is he?"

"I don't know. He has left this country. He is called Monsieur le Marquis de Lantenac, Viscount de Fontenay, Prince in Brittany; he is the lord of the Sept-Forêts (Seven Forests). I never saw him, but that does not prevent his being my master."

"And if you were to see him, would you obey him?"

"Indeed, yes. I should be a heathen if I did not obey him! I owe obedience to God, and then to the king who is like God, and then to the lord who is like the king. But we have nothing to do with all that, you killed my brother, I must kill you."

The old man replied:

"In the first place, I killed your brother. I did well."

The sailor grasped the pistol more firmly.

"Come," said he.

"So be it," said the old man.

And, still perfectly composed, he added:

"Where is the priest?"

The sailor stared at him.

"The priest?"

"Yes, the priest. I gave your brother a priest. You owe me one."

"I have none," said the sailor.

"Are priests to be found out at sea?"

The convulsive thunderings of battle sounded more and more distant.

"Those who are dying yonder have theirs," said the old man.

"That is true," murmured the sailor; "they have the chaplain."

The old man continued:

"You will lose me my soul, that is a serious matter."

The sailor bent his head in thought.

"And in losing me my soul," said the old man, "you lose your own. Listen. I have pity on you. Do what you choose. As for me, I did my duty a little while ago, first in saving your brother's life and afterward in taking it from him, and I am now doing my duty in trying to save your soul. Reflect. It is your affair. Do you hear the cannon-shots at this instant? There are men perishing yonder, there are desperate creatures dying, there are husbands who will never again see their wives, fathers who will never again see their children, brothers who, like you, will never again see their brothers. And by whose fault? your brother's—yours. You believe in God, do you not? Well, you know that God suffers at this moment; He suffers in the person of His Most Christian Son the King of France, who is a child as Jesus was and who is a prisoner in the fortress of the Temple; God suffers in His Church of Brittany; He suffers in His insulted cathedrals, His desecrated Gospels, in His violated houses of prayer; God suffers in His murdered priests. What did we intend to do, we, with that vessel which is at this moment perishing? We were going to help God. If your brother had been a good servant, if he had faithfully done his duty like a wise and prudent man, the accident of the carronade would not have occurred, the corvette would not have been disabled, she would not have got out of her course, she would not have fallen in with this fleet of perdition, and at this hour we should be landing in France, all, like valiant soldiers and seamen as we were, sabre in hand, the white flag unfurled, numerous, glad, joyful, and we should have gone to help the brave Vendean peasants to save France, to save the king, to save God. This was what we came to do, this was what we should have done. It is what I, the only one who remains, set out to do. But you oppose yourself thereto. In this contest of the impious against the priests, in this strife of the regicides against the king, in this struggle of Satan against God, you are on Satan's side. Your brother was the demon's first auxiliary; you are the second. He commenced, you finish. You are with the regicides against the throne, you are with the impious against the Church. You take away from God His last resource. Because I shall not be there, I, who represent the king, the hamlets will continue to burn, families to weep, priests to bleed, Brittany to suffer, the king to remain in prison, and Jesus Christ to be in distress. And who will have caused this? You. Go on, it is your affair.

I depended on you to help bring about just the contrary of all this. I deceived myself. Ah, yes, it is true, you are right, I killed your brother. Your brother was brave, I rewarded that; he was culpable, I punished him. He had failed in his duty. I did not fail in mine. What I did, I would do again. And, I swear by the great Saint Anne d'Auray, who sees us, that, in a similar case, I would shoot my son just as I shot your brother. Now, you are master. Yes, I pity you. You have lied to your captain. You, a Christian, are without faith; you, a Breton, are without honor; I was confided to your loyalty and accepted by your treason; you offer my death to those to whom you promised my life. Do you know who it is you are destroying here? It is yourself. You take my life from the king and you give your eternity to the Devil. Go on, commit your crime, it is well. You sell cheaply your share in Paradise. Thanks to you, the Devil will conquer, thanks to you, the churches will fall, thanks to you, the heathen will continue to melt the bells and make cannon of them; they will shoot men with that which used to warn souls. At this moment as I speak to you, perhaps the bell that rang for your baptism is killing your mother. Go on, aid the Devil. Do not hesitate. Yes, I condemned your brother, but, know this, I am an instrument of God. Ah, you judge the means God uses! will you take it on yourself to judge Heaven's thunderbolt? Wretched man, you will be judged by it. Take care what you are about to do. Do you even know whether I am in a state of grace? No. Go on all the same. Do what you like. You are free to cast me into hell and to cast yourself there with me. Our two damnations are in your hand. It is you who will be responsible before God. We are alone and face to face in the abyss. Go on, finish, make an end. I am old and you are young, I am without arms and you are armed; kill me."

While the old man, standing erect, uttered these words in a voice louder than the noise of the sea, the undulations of the waves showed him now in the shadow, now in the light; the sailor had grown lividly white; great drops of sweat fell from his forehead; he trembled like a leaf; he kissed his rosary again and again; when the old man finished speaking, he threw down his pistol and fell on his knees.

"Mercy, my lord! pardon me!" cried he; "you speak like the good God. I have done wrong. My brother did wrong. I will try to repair his crime. Dispose of me. Command. I will obey."

"I give you pardon," said the old man.

II.

THE PEASANT'S MEMORY IS AS GOOD AS THE CAPTAIN'S SCIENCE

The provisions which had been put into the boat proved useful.

The two fugitives, obliged to make long détours, took thirty-six hours to reach the coast. They passed a night at sea; but the night was fine, though there was too much moon to be favorable to those seeking concealment.

They were obliged first to row away from France and gain the open sea toward Jersey.

They heard the last broadside of the sinking corvette as one hears the final roar of the lion whom the hunters are killing in the wood. Then silence fell upon the sea.

The Claymore died like the Avenger; but glory has ignored her. He who fights against his own country is never a hero.

Halmalo was a marvelous seaman. He performed miracles of dexterity and intelligence; his improvisation of a route amid the reefs, the waves, and the enemy's watch, was a masterpiece. The wind had fallen and the sea grown more calm.

Halmalo avoided the Caux des Minquiers, skirted the Chaussée-aux-Bœufs, took shelter, in order that they might have a few hours' rest, in a little creek on the north side, practicable at low water, and, again rowing southward, found means to pass between Granville and the Chausey Islands without being discovered by the look-out either of Granville or Chausey. He entered the bay of Saint-Michel, which was a bold undertaking, on account of the neighborhood of Cancale, an anchorage for the cruising squadron.

On the evening of the second day, about an hour before sunset, he left Mont Saint-Michel behind him, and landed on a beach which is always deserted, because the shifting sands made it dangerous.

Fortunately it was high tide. Halmalo ran the boat aground, pushed it as far up as he could and sprang on shore.

The old man strode over the side after him and examined the horizon.

"Monseigneur," said Halmalo, "we are here at the mouth of the Couesnon. There is Beauvoir to starboard and Huisnes to larboard. The belfry in front of us, that is Ardevon."

The old man bent down to the boat, took a biscuit, which he put in his pocket, and said to Halmalo:

"Take the rest."

Halmalo put the remains of the meat and biscuit into the bag and slung it over his shoulder. This done, he said, "Monseigneur, must I guide or follow you?"

"Neither the one nor the other."

Halmalo looked at the speaker in stupefied wonder.

The old man continued:

"Halmalo, we must separate. There must not be two. There must be a thousand or one."

He paused and drew from one of his pockets a green silk bow, rather like a cockade, with a gold fleur-de-lis embroidered in the centre. He resumed:

"Do you know how to read?"

"No."

"That is well. A man who can read is troublesome. Have you a good memory?"

"Yes."

"That is good. Listen, Halmalo. You must go to the right and I to the left. I shall go in the direction of Fougères, you toward Bazouges. Keep your bag, it gives you the look of a peasant. Conceal your weapons. Cut yourself a stick in the thickets. Creep among the fields of rye, which are high. Slide behind the hedges. Climb the fences in order to go across the meadows. Leave passers-by at a distance. Avoid the roads and the bridges. Do not enter Pontorson. Ah! you will have to cross the Couesnon. How will you manage?"

"I shall swim."

"That's right. And then there is a ford. Do you know where it is?"

"Between Ancey and Vieux-Viel."

"That is right. You do really belong to the country."

"But night is coming on. Where will monseigneur sleep?"

"I can take care of myself. And you, where will you sleep?"

"There are hollow trees. Before I was a sailor, I was a peasant."

"Throw away your sailor's hat, it will betray you. You will easily find a woolen cap."

"Oh! a peasant's hat is to be found anywhere. The first fisherman I meet will sell me his."

"Very good. Now, listen. You know the woods?"

"All of them."

"Of the whole district?"

"From Noirmoutier to Laval."

"Do you also know their names?"

"I know the woods, I know their names, I know all about them."

"You will forget nothing?"

"Nothing."

"Good. Now, attention. How many leagues can you make in a day?"

"Ten, fifteen, eighteen. Twenty, if necessary."

"It will be. Do not lose a word of what I am about to say. You will go to the wood of Saint-Aubin."

"Near Lamballe."

"Yes. On the edge of the ravine between Saint-Rieul and Plédéliac there is a large chestnut-tree. You will stop there. You will see no one."

"Which will not hinder somebody's being there. I know."

"You will give the call. Do you know how to give the call?"

Halmalo puffed out his cheeks, turned toward the sea, and there sounded the "to-whit-to-hoo" of an owl.

One would have said it came out of the depths of the night. It was sinister and owl-like.

"Good," said the old man. "You have it."

He held out the bow of green silk to Halmalo.

"This is my badge of commandant. Take it. It is important that no one should as yet know my name. But this knot will be sufficient. The fleur-de-lis was embroidered by Madame Royal in the prison of the Temple."

Halmalo bent one knee to the ground. He trembled as he took the embroidered knot, and brought it near to his lips; then paused, as if frightened at this kiss:

"May I?" asked he.

"Yes; since you kiss the crucifix."

Halmalo kissed the fleur-de-lis.

"Rise," said the old man.

Halmalo rose and hid the knot in his breast.

The old man continued:

"Listen well. This is the watchword: Revolt. No quarter. Then, on the edge of the wood of Saint-Aubin you will give the call. You will repeat it three times. The third time you will see a man spring out of the ground."

"Out of a hole under the trees. I know."

"This man will be Planchenault, who is also called Cœur-de-Roi. You will show him this knot. He will understand. Then, by routes which you must find out, you will at once go to the wood of Astillé; there you will find a bandy-legged man, who is surnamed Mousqueton, and who shows pity to none. You will tell him that I love him, and that he is to set the parishes in motion. From there you will go to the wood of Couesbon, which is a league from Ploërmel. You will give the owl-cry; a man will come out of a hole; it will be M. Thuault, seneschal of Ploërmel, who has belonged to what is called the Constituent Assembly, but on the right side. You will tell him to arm the castle of Couesbon, which belongs to the Marquis de Guer, a refugee. Ravines, little woods, ground uneven, a good place. M. Thuault is a clever, straightforward man. Thence you will go to Saint-Ouen-les-Toits, and you will talk with Jean Chouan, who is, to my mind, the real chief. From there you will go to the wood of Ville-Anglose, where you will see Guitter, whom they call Saint-Martin; you will bid him keep his eye on a certain Courmesnil, who is the son-in-law of old Goupil de Préfeln, and who leads the Jacobinery of Argentan. Remember all this. I write nothing because nothing should be written. La Rouarie made out a list; it ruined all. Then you will go to the wood of Rougefeu where you will find Miélette who leaps the ravine with the aid of a long pole."

"It is called a ferte."

"Do you know how to use it?"

"Am I not a Breton and am I not a peasant? The ferte is our friend. She lengthens our arms and stretches our legs."

"That is to say, she makes the enemy smaller and shortens the route. A good machine."

"Once, with my ferte, I held my own against three salt-tax men who had sabres."

"When was that?"

"Ten years ago."

"Under the king?"

"Yes, of course."

"Then you fought in the time of the king?"

"Yes, to be sure."

"Against whom?"

"My faith, I do not know. I was a salt-smuggler."

"Very good."

"They called that fighting against the excise officers. Were they the same thing as the king?"

"Yes. No. But it is not necessary that you should understand that."

"I beg monseigneur's pardon for having asked a question of monseigneur."

"Let us continue. Do you know La Tourgue?"

"Do I know La Tourgue? I belong there."

"How?"

"Certainly, since I come from Parigné."

"Yes, La Tourgue is near Parigné."

"Do I know La Tourgue! the big round castle that belongs to my lord's family! There is a great iron door which separates the new part from the old that a cannon could not blow open. In the new building there is the famous book about Saint Bartholomew, which people go to look at from curiosity. There are frogs in the grass. When I was little, I used to go and play with the frogs. And the underground passage! I know that. Perhaps there is nobody else left who does."

"What underground passage? I do not know what you mean."

"It was made in olden times, for use when La Tourgue was besieged. The people inside could escape by going through the underground passage which leads into the wood."

"There is a subterranean passage of that description in the castle of Jupellière, and in the castle of Hunaudaye, and in the tower of Champéon; but there is nothing of the sort at La Tourgue."

"Oh, yes, indeed, monseigneur. I do not know the passages that monseigneur speaks of. I only know that of La Tourgue, because I belong to the neighborhood. And besides, there is nobody but myself who does know about the passage. It was not talked about.

It was forbidden, because this passage had been used in the time of M. de Rohan's wars. My father knew the secret and showed it to me. I know how to get in and how to get out. If I am in the forest, I can go into the tower, and if I am in the tower, I can go into the forest. Without anybody seeing me. When the enemy enters there is no longer anyone there. That is what the passage of La Tourgue is. Oh! I know it."

The old man remained silent for a moment.

"It is evident that you deceive yourself; if there were such a secret, I should know it."

"Monseigneur, I am certain. There is a stone that turns."

"Ah, good! You peasants, you all believe in stones that turn and in stones that sing, in stones that go at night to drink from the neighboring brook. A pack of nonsense."

"But since I have made the stone turn . . . "

"Just as others have heard it sing. Comrade, La Tourgue is a fortress, sure and strong, easy to defend; but anybody who counted on a subterranean passage for getting out of it would be silly indeed."

"But, monseigneur . . . "

The old man shrugged his shoulders.

"We are losing time. Let us talk of what concerns us."

The peremptory tone cut short Halmalo's persistence.

The old man resumed:

"To continue. Listen. From Rougefeu you will go to the wood of Montchevrier; Bénédicité is there, the chief of The Twelve. There is another good fellow. He says a Bénédicité (blessing) while he has people shot. War and sentimentality do not go together. From Montchevrier, you will go . . ."

He stopped.

"I forgot the money."

He took from his pocket a purse and a pocket-book, and put them in Halmalo's hand.

"In this pocket-book there are thirty thousand livres in assignats—something like three livres ten sous; it is true that the assignats are false, but the real ones are just as worthless; and here in the purse, attention, are a hundred gold louis. I give you all I have. I have no need of anything here. Besides, it is better that no money should be found on me. To continue. From Montchevrier you will go to Antrain, where you will see M. de Frotté; from Antrain to La Jupellière, where you will see M. de Rochecotte; from La Jupellière to Noirieux, where you will find the Abbé Baudoin. Can you remember all this?"

"Like my paternoster."

"You will see M. Dubois-Guy at Saint-Brice-en-Cogle, M. de Turpin at Morannes, which is a fortified town, and the Prince de Talmont at Château-Gonthier."

"Will I be spoken to by a prince?"

"Since I speak to you."

Halmalo took off his hat.

"Everyone will receive you well when they have seen Madame's fleur-de-lis. Do not forget that you are going into the country of mountaineers and rustics. Disguise yourself. It will be easy to do. These republicans are so stupid, that with a blue coat, a three-cornered hat and a tricolored cockade you can pass anywhere. There are no longer regiments, there are no longer uniforms, the companies are not numbered; each man puts on any rag he pleases. You will go to Saint-Mhervé. There you will see Gaulier, called Grand-Pierre. You will go to the cantonment of Parné, where the men blacken their faces. They put gravel into their guns, and a double charge of powder, in order to make more noise; it is well done. But tell them, above all, to kill, kill, kill. You will go to the camp of the Vache-Noire, which is on a height, in the middle of the wood of La Charnie, then to camp Avoine, then to camp Vert, then to the camp of the Fourmis. You will go to Grand-Bordage, which is also called Haut-de-Prés, and is inhabited by a widow whose daughter married Treton, nicknamed the Englishman. Grand-Bordage is in the parish of Quélaines. You will visit Épineux-le-Chevreuil, Sillé-le-Guillaume, Parannes, and all the men in all the woods. You will make friends, and you will send them to the borders of the Haut-Maine and the Bas-Maine; you will see Jean Treton in the parish of Vaisges, Sans-Regret at Bignon, Chambord at Bonchamps, the Corbin brothers at Maisoncelles, and Petit-sans-Peur at Saint-Jean-sur-Erve. He is the one who is called Bourdoiseau. All that done, and the watchword, Revolt, No quarter, known everywhere, you will join the grand army, the Catholic and royal army, wherever it may be. You will see MM. D'Elbée, de Lescure, de la Rochejacquelein, all the chiefs who may chance to be still living. You will show them my commander's ribbon. They all know what it means. You are only a sailor, but Cathelineau is only a carter. This is what you must say to them from me: 'It is time to join the two wars; the great and the little. The great makes the most noise, the little does the most execution. The Vendée is good, the war of the Chouans is better; and in civil war the fiercest is the best. The success of a war is judged by the amount of harm it does.'"

He paused.

"Halmalo, I say all this to you. You do not understand the words, but you comprehend the things themselves. I gained confidence in you from seeing you manage the boat; you do not understand geometry yet you perform sea-manœuvres that are marvelous; he who can manage a boat can pilot an insurrection; from the way in which you have conducted this trick of the sea, I am certain you will fulfill all my commands well. I resume. You will tell this to the chiefs, in your own way, of course, but it will be well told: I prefer the war of the forest to the war of the plain; I have no wish to set a hundred thousand peasants in line and exposed to the grape-shot of the Blues and the artillery of Monsieur Carnot; in less than a month I wish to have five hundred thousand sharpshooters, ambushed in the woods. The Republican army is my game. Poaching is our way of waging war. Mine is the strategy of the thickets. Good; there is still another expression you will not catch; no matter; you will grasp this: No quarter! and ambushes everywhere! I depend more on the war of the Chouans than on the war of the Vendée. You will add that the English are with us. We catch the Republic between two fires. Europe assists us. Let us make an end of the Revolution. Kings will wage against it a war of kingdoms, let us wage against it a war of parishes. You will say this. Have you understood?"

"Yes. Put all to fire and sword."

"That is it."

"No quarter."

"To no one. That is it."

"I will go everywhere."

"And be careful. For in this country it is easy to become a dead man."

"Death does not worry me. He who takes his first step uses perhaps his last shoes."

"You are a brave fellow."

"And if I am asked monseigneur's name?"

"It must not yet be known. You will say you do not know it, and that will be the truth."

"Where shall I see monseigneur again?"

"Where I shall be."

"How shall I know?"

"Because all the world will know. I shall be talked of before eight days go by, I shall make examples, I shall avenge religion and the king, and you will know well that it is I of whom they speak."

"I understand."

"Forget nothing."

"Have no fear of that."

"Now go. May God guide you. Go."

"I will do all that you have bidden me. I will go. I will speak. I will obey. I will command."

"Good."

"And if I succeed . . ."

"I will make you a knight of Saint-Louis."

"Like my brother. And if I fail, you will have me shot?"

"Like your brother."

"Done, monseigneur."

The old man bent his head and seemed to fall into a sombre reverie. When he raised his eyes he was alone. Halmalo was only a black spot disappearing on the horizon.

The sun had just set.

The sea-mews and the hooded gulls flew homeward, from the sea.

That sort of inquietude which precedes the night made itself felt in space; the green frogs croaked, the kingfishers flew whistling out of the pools, the gulls and the rooks kept up their evening tumult; the cry of the shore birds could be heard; but not a human sound. The solitude was complete. Not a sail in the bay, not a peasant in the fields. As far as the eye could reach stretched a deserted plain. The great sand-thistles shivered. The white sky of twilight cast a vast livid pallor over the shore. In the distance the pools scattered over the plain looked like great sheets of pewter spread flat upon the ground. The wind moaned in from the sea.

TELLMARCH

I.

THE TOP OF THE DUNE

The old man waited till Halmalo disappeared, then drew his fisherman's cloak closely about him and set out on his course. He walked with slow steps, thinking deeply. He took the direction of Huisnes, while Halmalo went toward Beauvoir.

Behind him, an enormous black triangle, with a cathedral for a tiara and a fortress for a breastplate, with its two great towers to the east, one round, the other square, helping the mountain to support the weight of the church and village, rose Mont Saint-Michel, which is to the ocean what the Pyramid of Cheops is to the desert.

The quicksands of the bay of Mont Saint-Michel are imperceptibly swallowing up the dunes. At that time between Huisnes and Ardevon there was a very high one, now completely effaced. This dune, leveled by an equinoctial storm, had the peculiarity of being very ancient and of bearing on its summit a commemorative column, erected in the twelfth century in memory of the council held at Avranches against the assassins of Saint Thomas of Canterbury. From the top of this dune the whole district could be seen, and one could get one's bearings.

The old man walked toward this dune and ascended it.

When he reached the top, he sat down on one of the projections of the stones, with his back against the pillar, and began to study the kind of geographical chart spread beneath his feet. He seemed to be seeking a route in a district which had once been familiar. In this vast landscape, made indistinct by the twilight, there was nothing clearly defined but the horizon, stretching black against the sky.

He could perceive the roofs of eleven towns and villages; could distinguish for several leagues' distance all the bell-towers of the coast, which were built very high to serve in case of need as landmarks to boats at sea.

At the end of a few minutes the old man appeared to have found what he sought in this dim clearness; his eyes rested on an inclosure of trees, walls, and roofs, partially visible midway between the plain and the wood, it was a farm; he nodded his head in the satisfied way a man does who says to himself: "There it is;" and began to trace in the distance with his finger a route across the fields and hedges. From time to time he examined a shapeless, indistinct object stirring on the principal roof of the farm, and seemed to ask himself: "What can it be?" It was colorless and indistinct, owing to the gloom; it could not be a weather-cock because it floated, and there was no reason why it should be a flag.

He was weary, he willingly remained in his resting-place, and yielded passively to the vague forgetfulness which the first moments of repose bring to a tired man.

There is an hour of the day which may be called noiseless, it is the serene hour of early evening. It was now that hour. He enjoyed it; he looked, he listened, to what? the tranquility. Even savage natures have their moments of melancholy. Suddenly this tranquility was not troubled, but accentuated by the voices of persons passing below. They were the voices of women and children. There are sometimes these chimes of joy-bells unexpectedly ringing amid the shadows. The underbrush hid the group from whence the voices came, but it was moving slowly along the foot of the dune toward the plain and the forest. The clear, fresh tones distinctly reached the pensive old man; they were so near that he could catch every word.

A woman's voice said: "We must hurry ourselves, Flécharde. Is this the way?"

"No, yonder."

The dialogue went on between the two voices, one high-pitched, the other low and timid.

"What is the name of the farm we are stopping at?"

"L'Herbe-en-Pail."

"Will it take us much longer to get there?"

"A good quarter of an hour."

"We must hurry on to get our soup."

"Yes, we are late."

"We shall have to run. But those mites of yours are tired. We are only two women, we can't carry three brats. And you, you are already carrying one, my Flécharde. A regular lump of lead. You have weaned the little gormandizer, but you carry her all the same. A bad habit. Do me the favor to make her walk. Ah! so much the worse! The soup will be cold."

"Oh! what good shoes these are that you gave me! I should think they had been made for me."

"It is better than going barefooted."

"Hurry up, René-Jean!"

"He is the very one that hindered us. He must needs chatter with all the little peasant girls he met. Oh, he shows the man already!"

"Yes, indeed; he is going on five years old."

"I say, René-Jean, what made you talk to that little girl in the village?"

A child's voice, that of a boy, replied:

"Because I knew her."

The woman said:

"What! you know her?"

"Yes, ever since this morning; she played some games with me."

"Oh! what a man you are!" cried the woman. "We have only been three days in the neighborhood, that creature there is no bigger than your fist, and he has found a sweetheart already!"

The voices grew fainter and fainter. Then every sound died away.

II.

AURES HABET ET NON AUDIET

The old man sat motionless. He was not thinking; scarcely dreaming. About him was serenity, rest, safety, solitude. It was still broad daylight on the dune, but almost dark in the plain, and black night in the forest. The moon was rising; a few stars dotted the pale blue of the zenith. This man, though full of preoccupation and stern cares, lost himself in the ineffable sweetness of the infinite. He felt within him the obscure dawn of hope, if the word hope may be applied to the workings of civil warfare. For the moment it seemed to him that, in escaping from that inexorable sea, and in touching land once more, all danger had vanished. No one knew his name, he was alone, escaped from the enemy, having left no trace behind him, for the sea holds no trace, hidden, unknown, not even suspected. He felt an indescribable calm.

A little more and he would have fallen asleep.

That which made for this man, a prey within and without to such tumults, the strange charm of this tranquil hour, was the profound silence alike in earth and sky.

He heard nothing but the wind from the sea; but the wind is a continual bass, which almost ceases to be a noise, so accustomed does the ear become to its tone.

Suddenly he started to his feet.

His attention had been quickly awakened; he looked about the horizon. Then his glance fixed eagerly upon a particular point.

What he looked at was the belfry of Cormeray, which rose before him at the extremity of the plain. Something very extraordinary was indeed going on within it.

The belfry was clearly defined against the sky; he could see the tower surmounted by the spire, and, between the tower and the pyramid, the cage for the bell, square, and open at the four sides after the fashion of belfries in Brittany.

Now this cage appeared alternately to open and shut; at regular intervals, its lofty opening showed entirely white, then entirely black; the sky could be seen for an instant through it, then it disappeared; a gleam of light would come, then an eclipse; and the opening and shutting succeeded each other from moment to moment with the regularity of a hammer striking an anvil.

This belfry of Cormeray was in front of the old man, about two leagues from the place where he stood; he looked to his right at the belfry of Baguer-Pican, which rose equally straight and distinct against the horizon; the cage of the bell was opening and shutting, like that of Cormeray.

He looked to his left, at the belfry of Tanis; the cage of the belfry of Tanis opened and shut like that of Baguer-Pican. He examined all the belfries upon the horizon, one after another, to his left belfries of Courtils, of Précey, of Crollon, and the Croix-Avranchin; to his right the belfries of Raz-sur-Couesnon, of Mordrey, and of Pas; in front of him, the belfry of Pontorson. The cages of all these belfries were alternately white and black.

What did this mean?

It meant that all the bells were swinging.

In order to appear and disappear in this way they must be violently rung.

What was it? The tocsin, without doubt.

The tocsin was ringing madly, it was ringing on every side, from all the belfries, in all the parishes, in all the villages. And he could hear nothing.

This was owing to the distance and the wind from the sea, which, sweeping in the opposite direction, carried every sound of the shore out beyond the horizon.

All these mad bells calling on every side, and at the same time this silence; nothing could be more sinister.

The old man looked and listened.

He did not hear the tocsin, and he saw it. It was a strange sensation, that of seeing the tocsin.

Against whom was this rage of the bells directed?

Against whom did this tocsin sound?

III.

USEFULNESS OF BIG LETTERS

Assuredly some one was snared.

Who?

It could not be he. His arrival could not have been discovered. It was impossible that the acting representative should have received information; he had scarcely landed. The corvette had evidently foundered and not a man had escaped. And even on the corvette, Boisberthelot and La Vieuville alone knew his name.

The belfries kept up their savage sport. He mechanically watched and counted them, and his meditations, pushed from one conjecture to another, had those fluctuations caused by a sudden change from complete security to a terrible uncertainty. Still, after all, this tocsin might be accounted for in many ways, and he ended by reassuring himself with the repetition of: "In short, no one knows of my arrival and no one knows my name."

During the last few seconds there had been a slight noise above and behind him. This noise was like the fluttering of leaves. He at first paid no attention to it, but, as the sound continued, one might have said insisted on making itself heard, he at length turned round. It was in fact a leaf, but a leaf of paper. The wind was trying to tear off a large placard pasted on the stone above his head. This placard had been very lately fastened there, for it was still damp and offered a hold to the wind, which had begun to play with it, and was detaching it.

The old man had ascended the dune on the opposite side, and had not seen this placard as he came up.

He stepped upon the base where he had been seated, and laid his hand on the corner of the paper which the wind moved; the sky was clear, the June twilights are long; the bottom of the dune was in the shadow, but the top was still lighted up; a portion of the placard was printed in large letters, and there was still light enough for him to make it out. He read this:

"THE FRENCH REPUBLIC, ONE AND INDIVISIBLE.

"I, Prieur de la Marne, acting representative of the people to the army of the Côtes-de-Cherbourg—give notice:—The ci-devant Marquis de Lantenac, Vicomte de Fontenay, self-styled Prince of Brittany, secretly landed on the coast of Granville, is declared an outlaw.—A price is set on his head.—Any person bringing him, alive or dead, will receive the sum of sixty thousand livres.—This amount will not be paid in assignats, but in gold.—A battalion of the army of the Côtes-de-Cherbourg will be immediately dispatched for the apprehension of the ci-devant Marquis de Lantenac.—The parishes are ordered to lend every assistance.

"Given at the Town-hall of Granville, this 2d of June, 1793.

"(Signed) PRIEUR DE LA MARNE."

Under this name was another signature, in much smaller characters, and which he could not decipher on account of the failing light.

The old man drew down his hat over his eyes, pulled his sea cloak close together under his chin, and hurried down the side of the dune. It was unsafe to remain longer on this brightly-lighted summit.

He had perhaps already stayed too long; the top of the dune was the only point in the landscape which still remained visible.

When he reached the obscurity of the bottom, he slackened his pace.

He took the route which he had traced for himself toward the farm, evidently having reason to believe that he should be safe in that direction.

The plain was deserted. There were no passers-by at that hour.

Behind a thicket of underbrush, he stopped, undid his cloak, turned his vest the hairy side out, refastened the ragged cloak about his neck by its cord, and resumed his way.

The moon was shining.

He reached a point where two roads branched off, an old stone cross stood there. Upon the pedestal of the cross he could distinguish a white square which was most probably a notice like that which he had just read. He went toward it.

"Where are you going?" said a voice.

He turned round.

A man was standing in the hedge-row, tall like himself, old like himself, with white hair like his own, and even more in rags than himself. Almost his double.

This man leaned on a long stick.

The man repeated:

"I ask you where you are going?

"In the first place, where am I?" returned he, with an almost haughty composure.

The man replied:

"You are in the seigneury of Tanis, and I am its beggar, and you are its lord."

"I?"

"Yes, you, Monsieur le Marquis de Lantenac."

IV.

THE CAIMAND

The Marquis de Lantenac—we shall henceforth call him by his name—answered quietly :

"So be it. Give me up."

The man continued :

"We are both at home here, you in the castle, I in the bushes."

"Let us finish. Do your work. Give me up," said the marquis.

The man went on :

"You were going to the farm of Herbe-en-Pail, were you not?"

"Yes."

"Do not go."

"Why?"

"Because the Blues are there."

"Since how long?"

"These three days."

"Did the people of the farm and the hamlet resist?"

"No. They opened all the doors."

"Ah!" said the marquis.

The man pointed with his finger toward the roof of the farm-house, which could be perceived above the trees a short distance away.

"You can see the roof, monsieur le marquis?"

"Yes."

"Do you see what there is above it?"

"Something floating?"

"Yes."

"It is a flag."

"The tricolor," said the man.

This was the object which had attracted the attention of the marquis as he stood on the top of the dune.

"Is not the tocsin sounding?" asked the marquis.

"Yes."

"On whose account?"

"Evidently on yours."

"But I cannot hear it."

"The wind carries the sound the other way."

The man added:

"Did you see your placard?"

"Yes."

"They are hunting you."

And, casting a glance toward the farm, he added:

"There is a demi-battalion there."

"Of republicans?"

"Parisians."

"Very well," said the marquis; "march on."

And he took a step in the direction of the farm.

The man seized his arm.

"Do not go there."

"And where do you wish me to go?"

"Home with me."

The marquis looked steadily at the beggar.

"Listen, monsieur le marquis, my house is not fine, but it is safe. A cabin lower than a cave. For flooring a bed of sea-weed, for ceiling a roof of branches and grass. Come. At the farm you will be shot. In my house you may go to sleep. You must be tired; and to-morrow morning the Blues will march on, and you can go where you please."

The marquis studied this man.

"Which side are you on?" asked the marquis; "are you republican? are you royalist?"

"I am a beggar."

"Neither royalist, nor republican?"

"I believe not."

"Are you for or against the king?"

"I have no time for that sort of thing."

"What do you think of what is happening?"

"I have nothing to live on."

"Still you come to my assistance."

"I saw you were outlawed. What is the law? So one can be beyond it. I do not understand. As for myself, am I inside the law? am I outside the law? I don't know. To die of hunger, is that being within the law?"

"How long have you been dying of hunger?"

"All my life."

"And you save me?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"Because I said to myself: 'There is one poorer than I. I have the right to breathe; he has not.'"

"That is true. And you save me!"

"Of course. We are brothers, monseigneur. I ask for bread, you ask for life. We are a pair of beggars."

"But do you know there is a price set on my head?"

"Yes."

"How did you know?"

"I read the placard."

"You know how to read?"

"Yes. And to write, too. Why should I be a brute?"

"Then, since you can read, and since you have seen the notice, you know that a man would earn sixty thousand livres by giving me up?"

"I know it."

"Not in assignats."

"Yes, I know, in gold."

"Sixty thousand livres; do you know it is a fortune?"

"Yes."

"And that anybody giving me up would make his fortune?"

"Very well, what next?"

"His fortune!"

"That is exactly what I thought. When I saw you, I said to myself: 'Just to think that anybody by giving up that man yonder would gain sixty thousand livres, and make his fortune!' Let us hasten to hide him."

The marquis followed the beggar.

They entered a thicket. The beggar's den was there. It was a sort of chamber which a great old oak had allowed the man to take possession of within its heart; it was dug down among its roots and covered by its branches. It was dark, low, hidden, invisible. There was room for two.

"I foresaw that I might have a guest," said the beggar.

This species of underground lodging, less rare in Brittany than people fancy, is called in the peasant dialect a carnichot. The name is also applied to hiding-places contrived within thick walls.

It was furnished with a few jugs, a pallet of straw or dried wrack, with a thick covering of kersey, some tallow-dips, a flint and steel, and a bundle of furze twigs for tinder.

They stooped low, crept a little, reached the chamber which the great roots of the tree divided into fantastic compartments, and seated themselves on the heap of dry sea-weed which served as a bed. The space between two of the roots, which made the doorway, allowed a little light to enter. Night had come on, but the eye adapts itself to the darkness, and one always finds at last a little brightness among the shadows. A reflection from the moon's rays faintly silvered the entrance. In a corner was a jug of water, a loaf of buck-wheat bread, and some chestnuts.

"Let us sup," said the beggar.

They divided the chestnuts, the marquis contributed his morsel of biscuit, they bit into the same black loaf, and drank out of the jug, one after the other.

They talked.

The marquis began to question this man.

"So, no matter whether anything happens, or nothing happens, it is all the same to you?"

"Pretty much. You are the lords, you others. Those are your affairs."

"But after all, present events . . . "

"Pass away up out of my reach."

The beggar added presently, "Then there are things that go on still higher up, the sun that rises, the moon that increases or diminishes, those are the matters I occupy myself about."

He took a drink from the jug, and said: "Good fresh water!"

Then he asked:

"How do you find the water, monseigneur?"

"What is your name?" inquired the marquis.

"My name is Tellmarch, and I am called Le Caimand."

"I understand. Caimand is a local word."

"Which means beggar. I am also nicknamed Le Vieux."

He added:

"I have been called Le Vieux these forty years."

"Forty years! But you were a young man then."

"I was never young. You remain so always, you do, monsieur le marquis. You have the legs of a boy of twenty, you can climb the great dune; as for me, I begin to find it difficult to walk, at the end of a quarter of a league I am tired. Nevertheless, our age is the same; but the rich, they have an advantage over us, they eat every day. Eating is a preservative."

The beggar, after a silence, continued: "The poor, the rich, that makes a terrible business. That is what brings on the catastrophes. At least, it seems so to me. The poor want to be rich, the rich are not willing to be poor. I think that is about what it is at the bottom of it. I do not mix myself up with matters. Things are as they are. I am neither for the creditor nor for the debtor. I know there is a debt and that it is being paid. That is all. I would rather they had not killed the king, but it would be difficult for me to say why. After that, somebody will answer: 'But remember how they used to hang poor fellows on trees for nothing at all!' See, just for a miserable gunshot fired at one of the king's roebucks, I myself saw a man hung who had a wife and seven children. There is much to say on both sides."

Again he was silent for a while, then, he added:

"You see, I do not know which is right, they come, they go, things happen; as for myself, I am up in the stars."

Tellmarch seemed to be thinking, then he continued:

"I am a little of a bone-setter, a little of a doctor, I know the herbs, I study plants, the peasants see me preoccupied and that makes me pass for a sorcerer. Because I dream, they think I must be wise."

"You belong to the neighborhood?" asked the marquis.

"I never was out of it."

"You know me?"

"Of course. The last time I saw you was when you passed through here, two years ago. You went from here to England. A little while since I saw a man on the top of the dune. A very tall man. Tall men are rare; Brittany is a country of small men. I looked closely, I had read the notice. I said to myself: 'Ah, ha!' And when you came down, it was moonlight, I recognized you."

"And yet, I do not know you."

"You have seen me, but you never looked at me."

And Tellmarch the Caimand added:

"I looked at you, though. The giver and the beggar do not look with the same eyes."

"Had I met you before?"

"Often, since I am your beggar. I was the poor wretch at the foot of the road from your castle. You have given me alms; but he who gives does not notice, he who receives examines and observes. When you say beggar, you say spy. But as for me, though I am often sad, I try not to be a malicious spy. I used to hold out my hand, you only saw the hand, and you threw into it the charity I needed in the morning in order that I might not die in the evening. I have often been twenty-four hours without eating. Sometimes a penny is life. I owe you my life, I pay the debt."

"That is true; you save me."

"Yes, I save you, monseigneur."

And Tellmarch's voice grew solemn as he added:

"On one condition."

"And that?"

"That you are not come here to do harm."

"I come here to do good," said the marquis.

"Let us sleep," said the beggar.

They lay down side by side on the sea-weed bed. The beggar fell asleep immediately. The marquis, although very tired, remained thinking deeply for a few moments, then, in the shadow, he gazed fixedly at the beggar, and lay back. To lie on that bed was to lie on the ground; he took advantage of this to put his ear to the earth and listen. He could hear a strange buzzing underground; he knew that sound is carried down into the earth; he could hear the noise of the bells.

The tocsin was still sounding.

The marquis fell asleep.

V.

SIGNED GAUVAIN

When he awoke, it was daylight.

The beggar was standing up, not in the den, for he could not hold himself erect there, but without, on the sill. He was leaning on his stick. The sun shone upon his face.

"Monseigneur," said Tellmarch, "four o'clock has just sounded from the belfry of Tanis. I could count the strokes; therefore the wind has changed, it is a land breeze. I can hear no other sound; so the tocsin has ceased. Everything is quiet about the farm and hamlet of Herbe-en-Pail. The Blues are asleep or gone. The worst of the danger is over; it will be wise for us to separate. It is my hour for setting out."

He indicated a point in the horizon.

"I am going that way." And he pointed in the opposite direction.

"Go you this way."

The beggar made the marquis a gesture of salute.

He added as he pointed to the remains of the supper:

"Take the chestnuts with you if you are hungry."

A moment after he disappeared among the trees.

The marquis rose and set out in the direction which Tellmarch had indicated.

It was that charming hour called in the old Norman peasant dialect "la piperette du jour." The finches and the hedge-sparrows flew chirping about. The marquis followed the path by which they had come on the previous night. He passed out of the thicket and found himself at the fork of the road marked by the stone cross. The placard was still there, looking white and quite gay in the rising sun. He remembered that there was something at the bottom of the placard which he had not been able to read the evening before on account of the twilight and the smallness of the letters. He went up to the foot of the cross. Under the signature "PRIEUR DE LA MARNE," there were yet two other lines in small characters:

"The identity of the ci-devant Marquis de Lantenac established, he will be immediately shot.

"Signed: Chief of battalion, commanding the exploring column, GAUVAIN."

"Gauvain!" said the marquis.

He stood still thinking deeply, his eyes fixed on the notice.

"Gauvain!" repeated he.

He resumed his march, turned about, looked again at the cross, walked back, and once more read the placard.

Then he went slowly away. Had any one been near, they might have heard him murmur, in a low voice: "Gauvain!"

From the sunken paths into which he retreated, he could only see the roofs of the farm which lay to the left. He passed along the side of a steep hill covered with furze, of the species called long-thorn, in blossom. The summit of this height was one of those points of land called in Brittany a hure (head). At the foot of the eminence the gaze lost itself among the trees. The foliage seemed bathed in light. All nature was filled with the deep joy of the morning.

Suddenly this landscape became terrible. It was like the bursting forth of an ambuscade. An appalling, indescribable trumpeting, made by savage cries and gun-shots, struck upon these fields and these woods filled with sunlight, and there could be seen rising, from the side toward the farm, a great smoke cut by clear flames, as if the hamlet and the farm buildings were burning like a truss of straw. It was sudden and fearful, the abrupt change from peace to fury, an explosion of hell in the midst of dawn, a horror without transition. There was fighting in the direction of Herbe-en-Pail. The marquis stood still.

There is no man who, in a similar case, would not feel curiosity stronger than a sense of the peril; one must know what is happening, even if one perish in the attempt. He climbed the hill along the bottom of which passed the sunken path by which he had come. From there he could be seen, but he could also see. He remained on the top for some instants. He looked about.

There was, in truth, a fusillade and a conflagration. He could hear the cries, he could see the flames. The farm appeared the centre of some terrible catastrophe. What could it be? Was the farm of Herbe-en-Pail attacked? But by whom? Was it a battle? Was it not rather a military execution? Very often the Blues, and they were ordered to do so by a revolutionary decree, punished refractory farms and villages by setting them on fire, they burned, for example, every farm-house and hamlet where the tree-cutting prescribed by law had been neglected, or no roads opened among the thickets for the passage of the republican cavalry. Only very lately, the parish of Bourgon, near Ernée, had been thus destroyed. Was Herbe-en-Pail receiving similar treatment? It was evident that none of the strategic routes called for by the decree had been made in the underbrush and in the inclosures of Tanis and Herbe-en-Pail. Was this the punishment for such neglect? Had an order been received by the advance-guard occupying the farm? Did not this troop make part of one of those exploring divisions called the "infernal columns?"

A bristling and savage thicket surrounded on all sides the hill upon which the marquis had posted himself for an outlook. This thicket, which was called the grove of Herbe-en-Pail, but which had the proportions of a wood, stretched to the farm, and concealed, like all Breton copses, a network of ravines, by-paths, and deep cuttings, labyrinths where the republican armies lost themselves.

The execution, if it were an execution, must have been a ferocious one, for it was short. It had been, like all brutal deeds, quickly accomplished. The atrocity of civil wars admits of these savage vagaries. While the marquis, multiplying conjectures, hesitating to descend, hesitating to remain, listened and watched, this crash of extermination ceased, or, more correctly speaking, vanished. The marquis took note of something in the thicket like the scattering of a wild and joyous troop. A frightful rushing about made itself heard beneath the trees. From the farm the band had thrown themselves into the wood. Drums beat. No more gunshots were fired; it now resembled a battue; they seemed to search, to follow, to track; they were evidently hunting some one; the noise was scattered and deep; it was a confusion of words of wrath and triumph, of indistinct cries and clamor, one could hear nothing distinctly. Suddenly, as an outline becomes visible in a cloud of smoke, something was spoken clearly and distinctly amid this tumult, it was a name, a name repeated by a thousand voices, and the marquis plainly heard this cry: "Lantenac! Lantenac! The Marquis de Lantenac!"

It was he whom they were hunting.

VI.

THE CHANGING FORTUNES OF CIVIL WAR

And suddenly, all about him, and from all sides at the same time, the copse filled with muskets, bayonets, and sabres, a tricolored flag rose in the half-light, the cry of "Lantenac!" burst forth in his very ear, and, at his feet, behind the brambles and branches, savage faces appeared.

The marquis was alone, standing on a height, visible from every part of the wood. He could scarcely see those who shrieked his name, but he was seen by all. If a thousand muskets were in the wood, he was there like a target. He could distinguish nothing among the brushwood but burning eyeballs fastened upon him.

He took off his hat, turned back the brim, tore a long, dry thorn from a furze-bush, drew from his pocket a white cockade, fastened the upturned brim and the cockade to the hat with the thorn, and, putting back on his head the hat, whose lifted edge showed the white cockade and left his face in full view, he cried in a loud voice that rang like a trumpet through the forest:

"I am the man you seek. I am the Marquis de Lantenac, Vicomte de Fontenay, Prince of Brittany, lieutenant-general of the armies of the king. Now make an end. Aim! Fire!"

And, tearing open with both hands his goat-skin vest, he bared his naked breast.

He looked down, expecting to meet leveled guns, and saw himself surrounded by kneeling men.

A great shout arose: "Long live Lantenac! Long live monseigneur! Long live the general!"

At the same time hats were flung into the air, sabres whirled joyously, and through all the thicket could be seen rising sticks on whose points waved caps of brown wool.

He was surrounded by a Vendean band.

This troop had knelt at sight of him.

Old legends tell of strange beings that were found in the ancient Thuringian forests, a race of giants, more and less than men, who were regarded by the Romans as horrible monsters, by the Germans as divine incarnations, and who, as chance willed, ran the risk of being exterminated or worshipped.

The marquis experienced something of the same feeling which must have shaken one of those creatures when, expecting to be treated like a monster, he suddenly found himself worshipped as a god.

All those eyes, full of terrible lightnings, were fastened on the marquis with a sort of savage love.

This crowd was armed with muskets, sabres, scythes, poles, sticks; they wore large felt hats or brown caps, with white cockades, a profusion of rosaries and amulets, wide breeches open at the knee, jackets of skins, leather gaiters, the calves of their legs bare, their hair long, some with a ferocious look, all with an open one.

A man, young and of noble mien, passed through the kneeling throng and hurried toward the marquis. Like the peasants, he wore a turned-up felt hat and a white cockade, and was wrapped in a fur jacket, but his hands were white and his linen fine, and he wore over his vest a white silk scarf from which hung a gold-hilted sword.

When he reached the hill, he threw aside his hat, untied his scarf, bent one knee to the ground, presented the sword and scarf to the marquis, and said:

"We were indeed seeking you, we have found you. Accept the sword of command. These men are now yours. I was their leader, I mount in grade, for I become your soldier. Accept our homage, monseigneur. General, give your orders."

Then he made a sign, and the men who carried a tricolored flag moved out of the wood. These men marched up to where the marquis stood and laid the banner at his feet. It was the flag which he had just caught sight of through the trees.

"General," said the young man who had presented to him the sword and scarf, "this is the flag we just took from the Blues who held the farm of Herbe-en-Pail. Monseigneur, I am named Gavard. I belong to the Marquis de la Rouarie."

"It is well," said the marquis.

And, calm and grave, he put on the scarf.

Then he drew his sword, and, waving it above his head, he cried:

"Up! Long live the king!"

All rose.

Through the depths of the wood swelled a wild triumphant shout: "Long live the king! Long live our marquis! Long live Lantenac!"

The marquis turned toward Gavard.

"How many are you?"

"Seven thousand."

And as they descended the hill, while the peasants cleared away the furze-bushes to make a path for the Marquis de Lantenac, Gavard continued:

"Monseigneur, nothing more simple. All can be explained in a word. It only needed a spark. The reward offered by the Republic, in revealing your presence, roused the whole district for the king. Besides that, we had been secretly warned by the mayor of Granville, who is one of our men; the same who saved the Abbé Olivier. Last night they sounded the tocsin."

"For whom?"

"For you."

"Ah!" said the marquis.

"And here we are," pursued Gavard.

"And you are seven thousand!"

"To-day. We shall be fifteen thousand to-morrow. It is the Breton contingent. When M. Henri de la Rochejacquelein set out to join the Catholic army, the tocsin was sounded, and in one night six parishes, Isernay, Corqueux, the Échaubroignes, the Aubiers, Saint-Aubin, and Nueil, brought him ten thousand men. They had no munitions, they found in the house of a quarry-master sixty pounds of blasting-powder, and M. de la Rochejacquelein set off with that. We were certain you must be in some part of this forest and we were seeking you."

"And you attacked the Blues at the farm of Herbe-en-Pail?"

"The wind prevented their hearing the tocsin. They suspected nothing; the people of the hamlet, who are a set of clowns, received them well. This morning we surrounded the farm, the Blues were asleep, and we did the thing without any trouble. I have a horse. Will you deign to accept it, general?"

"Yes."

A peasant led up a white horse with military caparisons. The marquis mounted without the assistance Gavard offered him.

"Hurrah!" cried the peasants. The cries of the English were greatly in use along the Breton coast, in constant communication as it was with the islands of La Manche.

Gavard made a military salute, and asked:

"Where will you make your headquarters, monseigneur?"

"At first in the forest of Fougères."

"It is one of your seven forests, monsieur le marquis."

"We must have a priest."

"We have one."

"Who?"

"The curate of the Chapelle-Erbrée."

"I know him. He has made the voyage to Jersey."

A priest stepped out of the ranks, and said:

"Three times."

The marquis turned his head.

"Good-morning, monsieur le curé. You have work before you."

"So much the better, monsieur le marquis."

"You will have to hear confessions. Those who wish. Nobody will be forced."

"Monsieur le marquis," said the priest, "at Guéménée, Gaston forces the republicans to confess."

"He is a hairdresser," said the marquis. "Death ought to be free."

Gavard, who had gone to give some orders, returned.

"General, I wait your commands."

"First, the rendezvous in the forest of Fougères. Let the men disperse and make their way there."

"The order is given."

"Did you not tell me that the people of Herbe-en-Pail had received the Blues well?"

"Yes, general."

"You have burned the house?"

"Yes."

"Have you burned the hamlet?"

"No."

"Burn it."

"The Blues tried to defend themselves; but they were a hundred and fifty and we were seven thousand."

"Who were they?"

"Santerre's men."

"The one who ordered the drums to beat while the king's head was being cut off? Then it is a regiment of Paris?"

"A half-regiment."

"Its name?"

"General, it had on its flag: 'Battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge.'"

"Wild beasts."

"What is to be done with the wounded?"

"Put an end to them."

"What shall we do with the prisoners?"

"Shoot them."

"There are about eighty."

"Shoot all."

"There are two women."

"Them also."

"There are three children."

"Carry them off. We will see what shall be done with them." And the marquis rode on.

VII.

"NO MERCY." (WATCHWORD OF THE COMMUNE)—"NO QUARTER." (WATCHWORD OF THE PRINCES)

While all this was passing near Tanis, the beggar had gone toward Crollon. He plunged into the ravines, among the vast silent bowers of shade, inattentive to everything and attentive to nothing, as he himself had said, a dreamer rather than a thinker, for the thoughtful man has an aim and the dreamer has none, wandering, rambling, pausing, munching here and there a bunch of wild sorrel, drinking at the springs, occasionally raising his head to listen to the distant tumult, again falling back into the bewildering fascination of nature, warming his rags in the sun, hearing perhaps the noise of men, but listening to the song of the birds.

He was old, and moved slowly; he could not walk far; as he said to the Marquis de Lantenac, a quarter of a league fatigued him; he made a short circuit toward the Croix-Avranchin, and evening had come before he returned.

A little beyond Macey, the path he was following led to a sort of culminating point, bare of trees, from whence one could see very far, taking in the whole stretch of the western horizon to the sea.

A column of smoke attracted his attention.

Nothing calmer than smoke, but nothing more startling. There are peaceful smokes and there are evil ones. The thickness and color of a line of smoke marks the whole difference between war and peace, between fraternity and hatred, between hospitality and the tomb, between life and death. A smoke mounting among the trees may be a symbol of all that is most charming in the world, a hearth at home, or a sign of that which is most awful, a conflagration, and the whole happiness of man or his most complete misery is sometimes expressed in this thin vapor which the wind scatters at will.

The smoke which Tellmarch saw was disquieting.

It was black, with sudden gleams of red, as if the brasier from which it flowed burned irregularly and had begun to die out, and it rose above Herbe-en-Pail.

Tellmarch quickened his steps and walked toward this smoke. He was very tired, but he must know what this signified.

He reached the summit of a hill against whose side the hamlet and the farm were nestled.

There was no longer either farm or hamlet.

A heap of ruins was still burning, this was Herbe-en-Pail.

There is something which it is more saddening to see burn than a palace, it is a cottage. A cottage on fire is a lamentable sight. It is a devastation swooping down on poverty, the vulture pouncing upon the worms of the ground, there is in it a contradiction which chills the heart.

If we believe the Biblical legend, the sight of a conflagration changed a human being into a statue; for a moment Tellmarch seemed thus transformed. The spectacle before his eyes held him motionless. Destruction was completing its work amid unbroken silence. Not a cry arose; not a human sigh mingled with this smoke, this furnace labored and finished devouring the village, without any noise being heard save the creaking of the timbers and the crackling of the thatch. At times the smoke parted, the fallen roofs revealed the gaping chambers, the brasier showed all its rubies, rags turned to scarlet and miserable bits of furniture, tinted with purple, gleamed amid these vermilion interiors, and Tellmarch was stricken by the sinister bedazzlement of disaster.

Some trees of a chestnut grove near the houses had taken fire and were blazing.

He listened, trying to catch the sound of a voice, an appeal, a cry; nothing stirred, save the flames; everything was silent, save the conflagration. Was it that all had fled?

Where was the knot of people who lived and toiled at Herbe-en-Pail? What had become of this little band?

Tellmarch descended the hill.

A funereal enigma rose before him. He approached without haste and with fixed eyes. He advanced toward this ruin with the slowness of a shadow; he felt like a ghost in this tomb.

He reached what had been the door of the farm-house and looked into the court, which had no longer any walls and was confounded with the hamlet grouped about it.

What he had before seen was nothing. He had hitherto only caught sight of the terrible, the horrible now appeared to him.

In the middle of the court was a black heap, vaguely outlined on one side by the flames, on the other by the moonlight; this heap was a mass of men, these men were dead.

All about this human mound spread a great pool, which smoked a little; the flames were reflected in this pool, but it had no need of fire to redden it; it was blood.

Tellmarch went closer. He began to examine these prostrate bodies one after another; they were all dead.

The moon shone; the conflagration also.

These corpses were the bodies of soldiers. All had their feet bare; their shoes had been taken; their weapons were gone also; they still wore their uniforms, which were blue; here and there he could distinguish, among these heaped-up limbs and heads, shot-riddled hats with tricolored cockades. They were those Parisians who, on the previous evening, had been there, all living, in garrison at the farm of Herbe-en-Pail. These men had been executed, this was shown by the symmetrical position of the bodies; they had been shot down in order, and with care. They were all quite dead. Not a single death-gasp sounded from the mass.

Tellmarch examined each of these dead in turn, without omitting one; they were all riddled with balls.

Those who had shot them, in haste probably to get elsewhere, had not taken the time to bury them.

As he was about to go away, his eyes fell on a low wall in the court, and he saw four feet stretching out beyond an angle of this wall.

These feet had shoes on them; they were smaller than the others; Tellmarch went up to this spot. They were women's feet.

Two women were lying side by side behind the wall; they also had been shot.

Tellmarch stooped over them. One of the women wore a sort of uniform; by her side was a canteen, bruised and empty; she had been a vivandière. She had four balls in her head. She was dead.

Tellmarch examined the other. She was a peasant. She was as one dead, her mouth open. Her eyes were closed. There was no wound in her head. Her garments, which long marches, no doubt, had worn to rags, were disarranged by her fall, leaving her bosom half naked. Tellmarch pushed aside her dress, and saw on one shoulder the round wound which a ball makes; the shoulder-blade was broken. He looked at her livid breast.

"A nursing mother," murmured he.

He touched her. She was not cold.

She had no hurts beside the broken shoulder-blade and the wound in the shoulder.

He put his hand on her heart and felt a faint throb. She was not dead.

Tellmarch raised himself and cried out in a terrible voice:

"Is there no one here?"

"Is it you, Caimand?" replied a voice, so low that it could scarcely be heard.

At the same time a head was thrust out of a hole in the ruin.

Then another face appeared at another opening.

They were two peasants, who had hidden themselves, the only ones who survived.

The well-known voice of the Caimand had reassured them and brought them out of the holes in which they had taken refuge.

They advanced toward Tellmarch, both still trembling violently.

Tellmarch had been able to cry out, but he could not talk; strong emotions produce such effects.

He pointed with his finger to the woman stretched at his feet.

"Is she still alive?" asked one of the peasants.

Tellmarch gave an affirmative nod of the head.

"Is the other woman living?" asked the second man.

Tellmarch shook his head.

The peasant who had first shown himself continued:

"All the others are dead, are they not? I saw the whole. I was in my cellar. How one thanks God at such a moment for not having a family! My house burned, Blessed Saviour! they killed everybody. This woman here had three children. All little. The children cried: 'Mother!' The mother cried: 'My children!' They carried off the little ones and shot the mother. I saw it all. My God! my God! my God! Those who massacred everybody are gone. They were satisfied. But she is not dead, is she, she is not dead? Tell us, Caimand, do you think you could save her? Do you want us to help carry her to your den?"

Tellmarch made a sign which signified "Yes."

The wood was close to the farm. They quickly made a litter with branches and ferns. They laid the woman, still motionless, upon it, and set out toward the thicket, the two peasants carrying the litter, one at the head, the other at the feet, Tellmarch holding the woman's arm, and feeling her pulse.

As they walked, the two peasants talked, and, over the body of the bleeding woman, whose white face was lighted up by the moon, they exchanged frightened ejaculations.

"To kill all!"

"To burn everything!"

"Ah! my God! Is that the way things will go now?"

"It was that tall old man who ordered it to be done."

"Yes, it was he who commanded."

"I did not see him while the shooting was going on. Was he there?"

"No. He had gone. But no matter, it was all done by his orders."

"Then it was he who did the whole."

"He said: 'Kill! burn! no quarter!'"

"He is a marquis."

"Of course, since he is our marquis."

"How is it they call him now?"

"He is Monsieur de Lantenac."

Tellmarch raised his eyes to heaven, and murmured between his teeth:

"If I had known!"

CIMOURDAIN

I.

THE STREETS OF PARIS AT THAT TIME

People lived in public; they ate at tables spread outside the doors; women seated on the steps of the churches made lint as they sang the Marseillaise; Parc Monceaux and the Luxembourg Gardens were parade-grounds; there were gunsmiths' shops in operation in the street, they manufactured muskets before the eyes of the passers-by, who clapped their hands in applause; the words on every lip were: "Patience. We are in revolution." The people smiled heroically. They went to the theatre as they did at Athens during the Peloponnesian war; one saw play-bills such as these pasted at the street corners: "The Siege of Thionville."—"A Mother saved from the Flames."—"The Club of the Careless."—"The Eldest of the Popes Joan."—"The Philosopher-Soldiers."—"The Art of Village Love-making."—The Germans were at the gates; a report was current that the King of Prussia had secured boxes at the Opera. Everything was frightful, and no one was frightened. The mysterious law against the suspected, which was the crime of Merlin of Douai, held a vision of the guillotine above every head. A solicitor named Séran, who had been denounced, awaited his arrest, in dressing-gown and slippers, playing his flute at his window. Nobody seemed to have any leisure. All the world was in a hurry. Every hat bore a cockade. The women said: "We are pretty in red caps." All Paris seemed to be removing. The curiosity shops were crowded with crowns, mitres, sceptres of gilded wood, and fleur-de-lis, torn down from royal dwellings. It was the demolition of monarchy that was taking place. Copes and rockets were to be seen for sale hanging on the unhook-me-that's of the old clothesmen. At the Poncherons and Ramponneau's, men dressed out in surplices and stoles and mounted on donkeys caparisoned with chasubles, drank wine at the doors from cathedral ciboria. In the Rue Saint-Jacques, some barefooted street-pavers stopped the wheelbarrow of a peddler who had boots for sale, clubbed together, and bought fifteen pairs of shoes, which they sent to the Convention "for our soldiers." Busts of Franklin, Rousseau, Brutus, and, we must add, of Marat, abounded; under a bust of Marat in the Rue Cloche-Perce, was hung in a black wooden frame, under glass, an address against Malouet, with testimony in support of the charges, and these two marginal lines:

"These details were furnished me by the mistress of Silvain Bailly, a good patriotess, who had a liking for me.

"(Signed) MARAT."

The inscription on the fountain, in the courtyard of the Palais-Royal, "Quantos effundit in usus!" was hidden under two great canvases painted in distemper, the one representing Cahier de Gerville denouncing to the National Assembly the rallying cry of the "Chiffonistes" of Arles, the other, Louis XVI. brought back from Varennes in his royal carriage, and under the carriage a plank fastened by cords, on each end of which was seated a grenadier with fixed bayonet. Very few of the larger shops were open; peripatetic haberdashery and toy shops lighted by candles, which dropped their tallow on the merchandise, were dragged about by women; open-air shops were kept by ex-nuns, in blonde wigs; this mender, darning stockings in a stall, was a countess; that dressmaker a marchioness; Madame de Boufflers inhabited a garret, whence she could look out at her own hotel. Hawkers ran about offering the "papers of news." Persons who wore cravats that hid their chins were called "the scrofulous." Street-singers swarmed. The crowd hooted Pitou, the royalist song-writer, and a valiant man in the bargain, for he was twenty-two times imprisoned and taken before the revolutionary tribunal for slapping the seat of his breeches as he pronounced the word civism; seeing that his head was in danger, he exclaimed: "But it is just the opposite of my head that is in fault!" a witticism which made the judges laugh and saved his life. This Pitou ridiculed the rage for Greek and Latin names; his favorite song was about a cobbler, whom he called Cujus, and to whom he gave a wife named Cujusdam. They danced the carmagnole in great circles. They no longer said gentleman and lady, they said "citizen and citizeness." They danced in the ruined cloisters, with the church-lamps lighted on the altars, with cross-shaped chandeliers hanging from the vaulted roofs, and tombs beneath their feet. Blue "tyrant's waistcoats" were worn. There were "liberty-cap shirt-pins" made of white, blue, and red stones. The Rue de Richelieu was called the Rue de la Loi; the Faubourg Saint-Antoine was named the Faubourg de Gloire; a statue of Nature stood in the Place de la Bastile.

People pointed out to one another certain well-known personages, Chatelet, Didier, Nicholas and Garnier-Delaunay, who stood guard at the door of Duplay the joiner; Voullant who never missed a guillotine-day and followed the carts of the condemned, he called it "going to the red mass;" Montflabert, revolutionary juryman and marquis, who took the name of Dix Août. People watched the pupils of the École Militaire file past, qualified by the decrees of the Convention as "aspirants in the school of Mars," and by the crowd as "the pages of Robespierre." They read the proclamations of Fréron, denouncing those suspected of the crime of "negotiantism." Young "scamps," collected at the doors of the mayoralties, mocked at the civil marriages, thronging about the brides and grooms as they passed, and shouting: "Municipal marriages!" At the Invalides, the statues of the saints and kings were crowned with Phrygian caps. They played cards on the curb-stones at the crossings; the packs of cards were also in the full tide of revolution, the kings were replaced by genii, the queens by the goddess of Liberty, the knaves by figures representing Equality, and the aces by impersonations of Law. They tilled the public gardens; they plowed at the Tuileries. With all these excesses was mingled, especially among the conquered parties, an indescribable haughty weariness of life; a man wrote to Fouquier-Tinville: "Have the goodness to free me from existence. This is my address." Champcenetz was arrested for having cried out in the garden of the Palais-Royal: "When are we to have the revolution of Turkey? I want to see the republic à la Porte." Newspapers appeared in legions. The hairdressers' men curled the wigs of women in public, while the master read the Moniteur aloud; others, surrounded by eager groups, commented with violent gestures upon the journal Entendons-nous, of Dubois-Crancé, or the Trompette du Père Bellerose. Sometimes the barbers were pork-sellers as well, and hams and chitterlings might be seen hanging side by side with a golden-haired doll. Dealers sold in the open street "the wines of the refugees;" one merchant advertised wines of fifty-two sorts; others displayed harp-shaped clocks and sofas "à la duchesse;" one hairdresser had on his sign: "I shave the Clergy, I comb the Nobility, I arrange the Third Estate." People went to have their fortunes told by Martin, at No. 173 in the Rue d' Anjou, formerly Rue Dauphine. There was a lack of bread, of coals, of soap. Flocks of milch-cows might be seen coming in from the country.

At La Vallée, lamb sold for fifteen francs the pound. An order of the Commune assigned a pound of meat per head every ten days. People stood in files at the doors of the shops; one of these files has remained famous; it reached from a grocer's shop in the Rue du Petit-Carreau to the middle of the Rue Montorgueil. To form a line was called "holding the cord," from a long rope which was held in the hands of those standing in the row. Amid this wretchedness, the women were brave and gentle. They passed entire nights awaiting their turn to get into the bakers' shops. The Revolution resorted to expedients which were successful; she alleviated this widespread distress by two perilous means; the assignat and the maximum; the assignat was the lever, the maximum was the fulcrum. This empiricism saved France. The enemy, whether of Coblentz or London, gambled in assignats. Girls came and went, offering lavender-water, garters, false curls, and selling stocks; there were the jobbers of the Perron de la Rue Vivienne, with muddy shoes, greasy hair, and fur caps decorated with fox-tails, and the waifs from "the Rue de Valois," with varnished boots, toothpicks in their mouths, and hairy hats on their heads, to whom the girls said "thee and thou." Later, the people gave chase to them as they did to the thieves, whom the royalists styled "active citizens." For the time, theft was rare. There reigned a terrible destitution and a stoical probity. The barefooted and the starving passed with lowered eyelids before the jewelers' shops of the Palais-Égalité. During a domiciliary visit that the Section Antoine made to the house of Beaumarchais, a woman picked a flower in the garden; the crowd boxed her ears. Wood cost four hundred francs in coin per cord; people could be seen in the streets sawing up their bedsteads; in the winter the fountains were frozen; two pails of water cost twenty sous; every man made himself a water-carrier. A gold louis was worth three thousand nine hundred and fifty francs. A course in a hackney-coach cost six hundred francs. After a day's use of a carriage, this sort of dialogue might be heard: "Coachman, how much do I owe you?" "Six thousand francs." A greengrocer woman sold twenty thousand francs' worth of vegetables a day. A beggar would say: "Help me, in the name of charity! I lack two hundred and thirty francs to finish paying for my shoes." At the ends of the bridges might be seen colossal figures sculptured and painted by David, which Mercier insulted: "Enormous wooden Punches," said he. These gigantic figures symbolized Federalism and Coalition overturned. There was no faltering among this people. There was the sombre joy of having made an end of thrones. Volunteers abounded, offering their services. Each street furnished a battalion. The flags of the districts came and went, every one with its device. On the banner of the Capuchin district could be read: "Nobody can cut our beards." On another: "No other nobility than that of the heart." On all the walls were placards, large and small, white, yellow, green, red, printed and written, on which might be read this motto: "Long live the Republic!" The little children lisped "Ca ira."

These children were in themselves the great future.

Later, to the tragical city succeeded the cynical city; the streets of Paris have offered two revolutionary aspects entirely distinct, that before and that after the Ninth Thermidor; the Paris of Saint-Just gave place to the Paris of Tallien; and, such are the endless antitheses of God, immediately after Sinai, the Courtille appeared.

A period of public madness made its appearance. It had already been seen eighty years before. The people came out from under Louis XIV. as they did from under Robespierre, with a great need to breathe; hence the Regency which opened that century and the Directory which closed it. Two saturnalia after two terrorisms. France snatched the wicket-key and got beyond the puritanical cloister just as it did beyond the monarchical cloister, with the joy of a nation that escapes.

After the Ninth Thermidor, Paris was gay, but with an insane gayety. An unhealthy joy overflowed. To the frenzy for dying succeeded the frenzy for living, and grandeur eclipsed itself. They had a Trimalcion, calling himself Grimod de La Réynière; there was the "Almanac of the Gourmands." People dined in the entresols of the Palais-Royal to the din of orchestras of women beating drums and blowing trumpets; the "rigadooner" reigned, bow in hand; people supped à l'orientale at Méot's, surrounded by perfuming pans filled with perfumes. The artist Boze painted his daughters, innocent and charming heads of sixteen, "en guillotinées," that is to say, with bare necks and red shifts. To the wild dances in the ruined churches succeeded the balls of Ruggieri, of Luquet, of Wenzel, of Mauduit, of Montansier; to grave citizenesses making lint succeeded sultanas, savages, nymphs; to the naked feet of the soldiers covered with blood, dust, and mud succeeded women with their bare feet decorated with diamonds; at the same time, with shamelessness, improbity reappeared; it had its purveyors in high ranks and "la petite pègre" among the class below; a swarm of sharpers filled Paris, and every man was forced to guard well his "luc," that is, his pocket-book; one of the amusements of the day was to go to the Palace of Justice to see the female thieves on the stool of repentance, it was necessary to tie fast their petticoats; at the doors of the theatres the street boys opened cab doors, saying: "Citizen and citizeness, there is room for two." The Old Cordelier and the Friend of the People were no longer published, in their place were cried Punch's Letter and the Rogues' Petition; the Marquis de Sade presided at the Section of the Pikes, Place Vendôme. The reaction was jovial and ferocious; the Dragons of Liberty of '92 were reborn under the name of the Chevaliers of the Dagger. At the same time there appeared in the booths that type, Jocrisse. There were the "Merveilleuses" and in advance of these feminine marvels came the "Inconcevables;" people swore by sa "paole verte" and by sa "paole victimée;" they jumped back from Mirabeau to Bobèche. Thus it is that Paris sways back and forth; it is the enormous pendulum of civilization; it touches either pole in turn, Thermopylæ or Gomorrah. After '93 the Revolution passed through a singular occultation; the century seemed to forget to finish that which it had commenced, a strange orgy interposed itself, took the foreground, swept backward to the second awful Apocalypse, veiled the immeasurable vision, and laughed aloud after its fright; Tragedy disappeared in Parody, and, rising darkly from the bottom of the horizon, a smoke of carnival dimly hid the Medusa.

But in '93, the period of which we now speak, the streets of Paris still wore the grand and savage look of the beginning. They had their orators, such as Varlet, who traveled around in a booth on wheels, from the top of which he harangued the passers-by; their heroes, of whom one was called the "Captain of the iron-pointed sticks;" their favorites, among whom ranked Guffroy, the author of the pamphlet Rougiff. Some of these characters were mischievous; others had a healthy tone. One among them all, honest and fatal; it was that of Cimourdain.

II.

CIMOURDAIN

Cimourdain had a conscience pure but sombre. There was something of the absolute within him. He had been a priest, which is a grave matter. A man may, like the sky, possess a serenity which is dark and unfathomable; it only needs that something should have made night within his soul. The priesthood had made night in that of Cimourdain. He who has been a priest remains a priest.

That which makes night within a man may leave stars. Cimourdain was full of virtues and verities, but they shone among shadows.

His history is easily written. He had been a village curate and tutor in a great family; then he inherited a small legacy and gained his freedom.

He was above all an obstinate man. He made use of meditation as one does of pincers; he did not think it right to quit an idea until he had followed it to the end; he thought stubbornly. He understood all the European languages, and something of others besides; this man studied incessantly, which aided him to bear the burden of celibacy; but nothing can be more dangerous than such a life of repression.

Being a priest, he had from pride, chance, or loftiness of soul, been true to his vows; but he had not been able to guard his belief. Science had demolished faith; dogma had fainted within him. Then, as he examined himself, he felt that his soul was mutilated, and, as he could not nullify his priestly oath, he had tried to remake himself a man; but in an austere fashion; his family had been taken from him, he had adopted his country, a wife had been refused him, he had espoused humanity. This vast plenitude, at the bottom, is a void.

His peasant parents, in devoting him to the priesthood, had wished to elevate him above the common people; he had voluntarily returned among them.

And he went back with a passionate energy. He regarded the suffering with a terrible tenderness. From a priest he had become a philosopher, and from a philosopher, an athlete. Even while Louis XV. still lived Cimourdain felt himself vaguely republican. But belonging to what republic? To that of Plato perhaps, and perhaps also to the republic of Draco.

Forbidden to love, he set himself to hate. He hated lies, monarchy, theocracy, his garb of priest; he hated the present; and he called aloud to the future; he had a presentiment of it, he caught glimpses of it in advance, he pictured it awful and magnificent; according to his idea, to end the lamentable wretchedness of humanity required at once an avenger and a liberator. He worshiped the catastrophe from afar off.

In 1789, this catastrophe had arrived, and had found him ready. Cimourdain flung himself into this vast plan of human regeneration logically, that is to say, for a mind of his mould, inexorably. Logic knows no softening. He had lived through the great revolutionary years, and had felt the shock of their mighty breaths, '89, the fall of the Bastile, the end of the torture of the people; '90, the Nineteenth of June, the end of feudalism; '91, Varennes, the end of royalty; '92, the birth of the Republic. He had watched the growth of the Revolution; he was not a man to be afraid of that giant; far from it, this sudden growth in everything had revivified him; and, though already quite old, he was fifty and a priest ages faster than another man, he himself began to grow also. From year to year he saw events gain in grandeur, and he increased with them. He had at first feared that the Revolution would prove abortive, he watched it, it had reason and right on its side, he demanded success for it likewise; and, in proportion to the fear it caused the timid, his confidence strengthened. He desired that this Minerva, crowned with the stars of the future, should also be Pallas, with the Gorgon's head for a buckler. He desired that her divine glance should be able at need to fling back to the demons their infernal glare, and give them terror for terror.

Thus he reached '93.

'93 was the war of Europe against France and of France against Paris. And what was the Revolution? It was the victory of France over Europe and of Paris over France. Hence the immensity of that terrible moment, '93, grander than all the rest of the century.

Nothing could be more tragic, Europe attacking France and France attacking Paris. A drama which reaches the stature of an epic.

'93 is a year of intensity. The tempest is there in all its wrath and all its grandeur. Cimourdain felt himself at home. This distracted centre, terrible and splendid, suited the span of his wings. Like the sea-eagle amid the tempest, this man preserved his internal composure and enjoyed the danger. Certain winged natures, savage yet calm, are made for the battle of the winds. Souls of the tempest, such exist.

He had put aside pity, reserving it only for the wretched. He devoted himself to those sorts of suffering which cause horror. Nothing was repugnant to him. That was his kind of goodness. He was divine in his readiness to succor what was loathsome. He searched for ulcers in order that he might kiss them. Noble actions with a revolting exterior are the most difficult to undertake; he preferred such. One day at the Hôtel-Dieu, a man was dying, suffocated by a tumor in the throat, a fœtid, frightful abscess, contagious perhaps, which must be at once opened. Cimourdain was there; he put his lips to the tumor, sucked it, spitting it out as his mouth filled, emptied the abscess, and saved the man. As he still wore his priest's dress at the time, some one said to him: "If you were to do that for the king, you would be made a bishop." "I would not do it for the king," replied Cimourdain. The act and the response rendered him popular in the dark quarters of Paris.

So great was his popularity that he could do what he liked with those who suffered, wept, and threatened. At the period of the public wrath against monopolists, a wrath which was prolific in mistakes, it was Cimourdain who, by a word, prevented the pillage of a boat loaded with soap at the quay Saint-Nicolas, and dispersed the furious bands who were stopping the carriages at the barrier of Saint-Lazare.

It was he who, ten days after the tenth of August, headed the people to overthrow the statues of the kings. They slaughtered as they fell. In the Place Vendôme, a woman called Reine Violet, was crushed by the statue of Louis XIV. about whose neck she had put a cord, which she was pulling. This statue of Louis XIV. had been standing a hundred years; it was erected the twelfth of August, 1692; it was overthrown the twelfth of August, 1792. In the Place de la Concorde, a certain Guinguerlot was butchered on the pedestal of the statue of Louis XV., for having called the demolishers scoundrels. The statue was broken in pieces. Later, it was coined into sous. The arm alone escaped; it was the right arm which was extended with the gesture of a Roman emperor. At Cimourdain's request the people sent a deputation with this arm to Latude, the man who had been thirty-seven years buried in the Bastile. When Latude, a collar on his neck, a chain about his loins, was rotting alive in the bottom of that prison where he had been cast by the order of that king whose statue overlooked Paris, who could have prophesied to him that this prison would fall, that this statue would be destroyed, that he would emerge from the sepulchre and that monarchy would enter it, that he, the prisoner, would be the master of this hand of bronze which had signed his warrant, and that of this king of mud there would remain only his brazen arm?

Cimourdain was one of those men who have an interior voice to which they listen. Such men seem absent-minded; no; they are attentive.

Cimourdain was at once learned and ignorant. He understood everything in science and was ignorant of everything in life. Hence his severity. He had his eyes bandaged like the Themis of Homer. He had the blind certainty of the arrow which sees not the goal, yet goes straight to it. In revolution there is nothing so formidable as a straight line. Cimourdain went straight before him, fatal, unwavering.

He believed that, in a social Genesis, the farthest point is the solid ground; an error peculiar to minds which replace reason by logic. He went beyond the Convention; he went beyond the Commune; he belonged to the Évêché.

The society, called the Évêché, because its meetings were held in a hall of the old episcopal palace, was rather a complication of men than a union. There assisted, as at the Commune, those silent but significant spectators who, as Garat said, "had as many pistols as pockets." The Évêché was a strange mixture; a mixture at once cosmopolitan and Parisian, and excluding no one. Paris is the spot where beats the heart of the peoples. There was the great plebeian incandescence. In comparison with it, the Convention was cold and the Commune lukewarm. The Évêché was one of those revolutionary formations similar to volcanic ones; the Évêché contained everything, ignorance, stupidity, probity, heroism, rage, the police. Brunswick had agents there. It numbered men worthy of Sparta and men who deserved the galleys. The greater part were mad and honest. The Gironde had pronounced by the mouth of Isnard, president pro tem. of the Convention, this monstrous warning: "Take care, Parisians! of your city, there will not remain one stone upon another, and the day will come when men will search for the place where Paris stood." This speech created the Évêché. Certain men, and, as we have just said, men of all nations, felt the need of gathering themselves close about Paris. Cimourdain was drawn toward this group.

The society contained reactionists. It was born of that public necessity for violence which is the formidable and mysterious side of revolutions. Strong with this strength, the Évêché at once began its work. In the commotions of Paris, it was the Commune that fired the cannon, it was the Évêché that sounded the tocsin.

Cimourdain believed, in his implacable ingenuousness, that everything in the service of truth is justice; which rendered him fit to dominate the extremists on either side. Scoundrels felt that he was honest, and were satisfied. Crime is flattered by having virtue preside over it. It is at once troublesome and pleasant. Palloy, the architect who had turned to account the demolition of the Bastile, selling its stones to his own profit, and who, appointed to whitewash the cell of Louis XVI., in his zeal covered the wall with bars, chains, and iron rings; Gonchon, the suspected orator of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, whose receipts were afterward found; Fournier, the American, who on the seventeenth of July fired at Lafayette a pistol-shot, paid for, it was said, by Lafayette himself; Henriot, who had come out of Bicêtre, and who had been valet, mountebank, robber, and spy, before being a general and turning the guns on the Convention; La Reynie, formerly grand-vicar of Chartres, who had replaced his breviary by Père Duchêne; all these men were held in restraint by Cimourdain, and, at certain moments, to keep the worst of them from stumbling, it was sufficient that they feel his redoubtable and convincing candor as a judgment before them. It was thus that Saint-Just terrified Schneider. At the same time, the majority of the Évêché, composed principally as it was of poor and violent men, who being honest, believed in Çimourdain and followed him. He had for curate or aid-de-camp, whichever you please, that other republican priest, Danjou, whom the people loved on account of his height and had christened Abbé Six-Pieds. Cimourdain could have led where he would that intrepid chief whom they called General la Pique, and that bold Truchon named the Grand-Nicolas, who had tried to save Madame de Lamballe, and had given her his arm and made her spring over the corpses; an attempt which would have succeeded had it not been for the ferocious pleasantry of the barber Charlot.

The Commune watched the Convention, the Évêché watched the Commune. Cimourdain, naturally upright and detesting intrigue, had broken more than one mysterious thread in the hand of Pache, whom Beurnonville called "the black man." Cimourdain at the Évêché was on confidential terms with all. He was consulted by Dobsent and Momoro. He spoke Spanish with Guzman, Italian with Pio, English with Arthur, Flemish with Pereyra, German with the Austrian Proly, the bastard of a prince. He created a harmony between these discordances. Hence his position was obscure and strong. Herbert feared him.

Cimourdain possessed, in these times and among these tragic groups, the power of the inexorable. He was an impeccable who believed himself infallible. No person had ever seen him weep. Virtue inaccessible and glacial. He was the terrible offspring of Justice.

There is no half-way possible to a priest in a revolution. A priest can only give himself up to this wild and prodigious chance either from the highest or the lowest motive; he must be infamous or he must be sublime. Cimourdain was sublime, but sublime in isolation, in rugged inaccessibility, in inhospitable secretiveness; sublime amid a circle of precipices. Lofty mountains possess this sinister virginity.

Cimourdain had the appearance of an ordinary man, dressed in every-day garments, poor in aspect. When young, he had been tonsured; as an old man, he was bald. What little hair he had left was gray. His forehead was broad, and to the acute observer it revealed his character. Cimourdain had an abrupt way of speaking, passionate and solemn, his voice was quick, his accent peremptory, his mouth bitter and sad; his eye clear and deep, and over his whole countenance an indescribably indignant expression.

Such was Cimourdain.

No one to-day knows his name. History has many of these terrible unknown.

III.

A CORNER NOT DIPPED IN THE STYX

Was such a man truly a man? Could the servant of the human race know affection? Was he not too much a soul to possess a heart? This widespread embrace, which included everything and everybody, could it narrow itself down to one? Could Cimourdain love? We answer. Yes.

When young, and a tutor in an almost princely family, he had had a pupil, the son and heir of the house and he loved him. It is so easy to love a child. What can one not pardon in a child? One forgives him for being a lord, a prince, a king. The innocence of his age makes one forget the crime of race; the feebleness of the creature causes one to overlook the exaggeration of rank. He is so little that one forgives him for being great. The slave forgives him for being his master. The old negro idolizes the white child. Cimourdain had conceived a passion for his pupil. Childhood is so ineffable that one may expend all affections upon it. Cimourdain's whole power of loving prostrated itself, so to speak, before this boy; that sweet, innocent being became a sort of prey for that heart condemned to solitude. He loved with a mingling of all tendernesses, as father, as brother, as friend, as maker. The child was his son; the son, not of his flesh, but of his mind. He was not the father, and this was not his work; but he was the master, and this his masterpiece. Of this little lord he had made a man. Who knows? perhaps a great man. Such are dreams. Unknown to the family,—has one need of the permission of a family to create an intelligence, a will, an upright character?—he had communicated to the young vicomte, his scholar, all the advanced ideas which he himself held; he had inoculated him with the redoubtable virus of his virtue; he had infused into his veins his own convictions, his own conscience, his own ideal; into this brain of an aristocrat he had poured the soul of the people.

The spirit suckles; the intelligence is a breast. There is an analogy between the nurse who gives her milk and the preceptor who gives his thought. Sometimes the preceptor is more a father than the father, just as often the nurse is more a mother than the mother.

This deep spiritual paternity bound Cimourdain to his pupil. The very sight of the child softened him.

Let us add this: to replace the father was easy, the boy no longer had one; he was an orphan; his father and mother were both dead; to keep watch over him he had only a blind grandmother and an absent great-uncle. The grandmother died; the great-uncle, the head of the family, a soldier and a man of high rank, provided with appointments at court, avoided the old family dungeon, lived at Versailles, went forth with the army, and left the orphan alone in the solitary castle. So the preceptor was then master, in every sense of the word.

Let us add still further: Cimourdain had seen the child born who had been his pupil. The boy, while very little, was seized with a severe illness. In this peril of death, Cimourdain had watched day and night; it is the physician who prescribes, it is the nurse who saves, and Cimourdain had saved the child. Not only did his pupil owe to him education, instruction, science, but he owed him also convalescence and health; not only did his pupil owe him the development of his mind, he owed him life itself. Those who owe us all, we worship; Cimourdain adored this child.

The natural separation came about at length. The education completed, Cimourdain was obliged to leave the boy, grown to a young man. With what cold and unconscionable cruelty these separations are insisted upon! How tranquilly families dismiss the preceptor who leaves his spirit in a child, and the nurse, who leaves her heart's blood! Cimourdain, paid and put aside, went out of the grand world and returned to the sphere below; the partition between the great and the little closed again; the young lord, an officer of birth, and made captain at the outset, departed for some garrison; the humble tutor, already at the bottom of his heart an unsubmissive priest, hastened to go down again into that obscure ground-floor of the Church occupied by the under clergy; and Cimourdain lost sight of his pupil.

The Revolution came; the remembrance of that being whom he had made a man brooded within him, hidden but not extinguished by the immensity of public affairs.

To model a statue and give it life, that is beautiful; to mould an intelligence and instill truth therein, that is still more beautiful. Cimourdain was the Pygmalion of a soul.

The spirit may have a child.

This pupil, this boy, this orphan, was the sole being on earth whom he loved.

But even in such an affection would a man like this prove vulnerable?

We shall see.

BOOK TWO

THE WINE-SHOP OF THE RUE DU PAON

I.

MINOS, ÆACUS, AND RHADAMANTHUS.

There was a wine-shop in the Rue du Paon which was called a café. This café had a back room, which is to-day historical. It was there that often, almost secretly, met certain men so powerful and so constantly watched that they hesitated to speak with one another in public. It was there that on the twenty-third of October, 1792, the Mountain and the Gironde exchanged their famous kiss. It was there that Garat, although he does not admit it in his Memoirs, came for information on that lugubrious night when, after having put Clavière in safety in the Rue de Beaune, he stopped his carriage on the Pont-Royal to listen to the tocsin.

On the twenty-eighth of June, 1793, three men were seated about a table in this back chamber. Their chairs did not touch; they were placed one on each of the three sides of the table, leaving the fourth vacant. It was about eight o'clock in the evening; it was still light in the street, but it was dark in the back room, a lamp, a luxury at that time, hung from a hook in the ceiling, lighted the table.

The first of these three men was pale, young, grave, with thin lips and a cold look. He had a nervous movement in his cheek which must have made it difficult for him to smile. His hair was powdered, he wore gloves. His light-blue coat, well brushed and carefully buttoned, was without a wrinkle. He wore nankeen breeches, white stockings, a high cravat, a plaited shirt-frill, and shoes with silver buckles. Of the other two men, one was almost a giant, the other a sort of dwarf. The tall one was untidily dressed in a coat of scarlet cloth, his neck bare, his unknotted cravat falling down over his shirt-frill, his vest gaping from lack of buttons, he wore top-boots and his hair stood up stiffly and was disarranged, though it still showed traces of powder; his very peruke was like a mane. His face was marked with small-pox, there was a deep line between his brows, betokening a choleric temperament, a wrinkle that signified kindness at the corner of his mouth, his lips were thick, the teeth large, he had the fist of a porter, and eyes that blazed. The little one was a yellow man, who when seated, looked deformed; he carried his head thrown back, his eyes were bloodshot, there were livid blotches on his face, a handkerchief was knotted about his straight, greasy hair, he had no forehead, the mouth was enormous and horrible. He wore pantaloons, instead of knee-breeches, slippers, a waistcoat which seemed originally to have been of white satin, and over this a loose jacket, under whose folds a hard, straight line showed that a poniard was hidden.

The first of these men was named Robespierre, the second, Danton, the third, Marat.

They were alone in the room. Before Danton was set a glass and a dusty wine-bottle, reminding one of Luther's half-pint of beer, before Marat a cup of coffee, before Robespierre only papers.

Near the papers stood one of those heavy, round, ridged, leaden inkstands which will be remembered by men who were schoolboys at the beginning of this century. A pen was lying by the side of the inkstand. On the papers lay a great brass seal, on which could be read Palloy fecit, and which was a perfect miniature model of the Bastile.

A map of France was spread in the middle of the table.

Outside the door was stationed Marat's "watch-dog," a certain Laurent Basse, porter, of number eighteen, Rue des Cordeliers, who, on the thirteenth of July, some fifteen days after this twenty-eighth of June, was to deal a blow with a chair on the head of a woman named Charlotte Corday, at this moment vaguely dreaming in Caen. Laurent Basse was the proof-carrier of the Friend of the People. This evening, brought by his master to the café of the Rue du Paon, he had been ordered to keep the room closed where Marat, Danton, and Robespierre were seated, and to allow no person to enter, unless it might be some member of the Committee of Public Safety, the Commune, or the Évêché.

Robespierre did not wish to shut the door against Saint-Just, Danton did not want it closed against Pache, Marat would not shut it against Guzman.

The conference had already lasted a long time. It was in reference to the papers spread on the table, which Robespierre had read. The voices began to grow louder. Vague mutterings of anger arose between these three men. From without the words could at times be plainly heard. At that period the example of the public tribunals seemed to have created the right to listen at doors. It was the time when the copying-clerk Fabricius Pâris looked through the key-hole at the proceedings of the Committee of Public Safety. A feat which, be it said by the way, was not without its use, for it was this Pâris who warned Danton on the night before the thirty-first of March, 1794. Laurent Basse had his ear to the door of the back room where Danton, Marat, and Robespierre were. Laurent Basse served Marat, but he belonged to the Évêché.

II.

MAGNA TESTANTUR VOCE PER UMBRAS

Danton had just risen; he had violently pushed back his chair.

"Listen!" cried he. "There is only one thing imminent, the peril of the Republic. I only know one thing, to deliver France from the enemy. To accomplish that all means are fair. All! all! all! When I have to deal with a combination of dangers, I have recourse to every or any expedient, and when I fear all, I brave all. My thought is a lioness. No half-measures, no squeamishness in revolution. Nemesis is not a prude. Let us be terrible, and useful. Does the elephant stop to look where he sets his foot? We must crush the enemy."

Robespierre mildly replied:

"I shall be very glad."

And he added:

"The question is to know where the enemy is."

"It is outside, and I have driven it there," said Danton.

"It is within, and I watch it," said Robespierre.

"And I will continue to pursue it," resumed Danton.

"One does not drive away an internal enemy."

"What, then, do you do?"

"Exterminate it."

"I agree to that," said Danton in turn.

Then he continued:

"I tell you, Robespierre, it is without."

"Danton, I tell you it is within."

"Robespierre, it is on the frontier."

"Danton, it is in the Vendée."

"Calm yourselves," said a third voice, "it is everywhere; and you are lost."

It was Marat who spoke.

Robespierre looked at him and answered tranquilly:

"A truce to generalities. I particularize. Here are facts."

"Pedant!" grumbled Marat.

Robespierre laid his hand on the papers spread before him and continued:

"I have just read you the dispatches from Prieur de la Marne. I have just communicated to you the information given by that Gélambre. Danton, listen. Foreign war is nothing. Civil war is everything. Foreign war is a scratch that one gets on the elbow; civil war is the ulcer which eats up the liver. All that which I have just read to you, is summed up in this: the Vendée, up to this day divided between several chiefs, is concentrating herself. Henceforth she will have but one captain . . ."

"A central brigand," murmured Danton.

"Who is," pursued Robespierre, "the man that landed near Pontorson on the second of June. You have seen who he was. Remember this landing coincides with the arrest of the acting representatives, Prieur de la Côte-d'Or and Romme, at Bayeux, by the traitorous district of Calvados, the second of June, the same day."

"And their transfer to the castle of Caen," said Danton.

Robespierre resumed: "I continue my summing up of the dispatches. The war of the woods is organizing on a vast scale. At the same time an English invasion is preparing; Vendeans and English, it is Briton with Breton. The Hurons of Finistère speak the same language as the Topinambes of Cornwall. I have shown you an intercepted letter from Puisaye, in which it is said that 'twenty thousand red-coats distributed among the insurgents will be the means of raising a hundred thousand more.' When the peasant insurrection is prepared the English descent will be made. Look at the plan. Follow it on the map."

Robespierre put his finger on the chart and went on: "The English have the choice of a landing-place, from Cancale to Paimpol. Craig would prefer the Bay of Saint-Brieuc; Cornwallis, the Bay of Saint-Cast. That is mere detail. The left bank of the Loire is guarded by the rebel Vendean army, and, as for the twenty-eight leagues of open country between Ancenis and Pontorson, forty Norman parishes have promised their aid. The descent will be made at three points, Plérin, Iffiniac, and Pléneuf; from Plérin they can go to Saint-Brieuc, and from Pléneuf to Lamballe; the second day they will reach Dinan, where there are nine hundred English prisoners, and at the same time they will occupy Saint-Jouan and Saint-Méen; they will leave cavalry there; on the third day, two columns will march, the one from Jouan on Bedée, the other from Dinan on Becherel, which is a natural fortress, and where they will establish two batteries; the fourth day they will reach Rennes. Rennes is the key of Brittany. Whoever has Rennes has the whole. Rennes captured, Châteauneuf and Saint-Malo will fall. There are at Rennes a million of cartridges and fifty artillery field-pieces . . ."

"Which they will carry away," murmured Danton.

Robespierre continued:

"I conclude. From Rennes three columns will fall, the one on Fougères, the other on Vitré, the third on Redon. As the bridges are cut, the enemy will furnish themselves, you have seen this fact particularly stated, with pontoons and planks, and they will have guides for the points fordable by the cavalry. From Fougères they will stretch to Avranches, from Redon to Ancenis; from Vitré to Laval. Nantes will capitulate. Brest will yield. Redon opens the whole extent of the Vilaine, Fougères gives them the road to Normandy; Vitré opens the road to Paris. In fifteen days they will have an army of brigands numbering three hundred thousand men, and all Brittany will belong to the King of France."

"That is to say, to the King of England," said Danton.

"No. To the King of France."

And Robespierre added:

"The King of France is worse. It needs fifteen days to expel the stranger, and eighteen hundred years to eliminate monarchy."

Danton, who had reseated himself, leaned his elbows on the table, and rested his head in his hands in a thoughtful attitude.

"You see the peril," said Robespierre. "Vitré lays open to the English the road to Paris."

Danton raised his head and struck his two great clenched hands on the map, as on an anvil.

"Robespierre, did not Verdun open the route to Paris to the Prussians?"

"Well?"

"Well, we will expel the English as we expelled the Prussians."

And Danton again stood up.

Robespierre laid his cold hand on the feverish fist of the other.

"Danton, Champagne was not for the Prussians, and Brittany is for the English. To retake Verdun was a foreign war; to retake Vitré will be civil war."

And Robespierre murmured in a cold, quiet voice:

"A serious difference."

He added aloud:

"Sit down again, Danton, and look at the map instead of knocking it with your fist."

But Danton was wholly given up to his own idea.

"That is madness!" cried he. "To look for the catastrophe in the west when it is in the east. Robespierre, I grant you that England is rising on the ocean; but Spain is rising among the Pyrenees; Italy is rising among the Alps; Germany is rising on the Rhine. And the great Russian bear is at the bottom.

Robespierre, the danger is a circle and we are within it. Outside, coalition; inside, treason. In the south, Servant half opens the door of France to the King of Spain, at the north Dumouriez passes over to the enemy. For that matter, he always menaced Holland less than Paris. Nerwinde blots out Jemmapes and Valmy. The philosopher Rabaut Saint-Étienne, a traitor like the Protestant he is, corresponds with the courtier Montesquiou. The army is destroyed. There is not a battalion now that has more than four hundred men left; the brave regiment of Deux-Ponts is reduced to a hundred and fifty men; the camp of Pamars has capitulated; there are only five hundred sacks of flour left at Givet; we are falling back on Landau; Wurmser presses Kléber; Mayence succumbs bravely, Condé, is a coward. Valenciennes also. But all that does not prevent Chancel, who defends Valenciennes, and old Féraud, who defends Condé, from being heroes, as well as Meunier, who defended Mayence. But all the rest are betraying us. Dharville betrayed us at Aix-la-Chapelle, Mouton betrayed us at Brussels, Valence betrayed us at Bréda, Neuilly betrayed us at Limbourg, Miranda betrayed us at Maëstricht, Stengel, traitor, Lanoue, traitor, Ligonnier, traitor, Menou, traitor, Dillon, traitor; hideous coin of Dumouriez.

We must make examples. Custine's countermarches look suspicious to me; I suspect Custine of preferring the lucrative prize of Frankfort to the useful capture of Coblentz. Frankfort can pay four millions of war tribute, so be it. What would that be in comparison with crushing that nest of refugees? Treason, say I. Meunier died on the thirteenth of June. Kléber is alone. In the meantime, Brunswick strengthens and advances. He plants the German flag on every French place that he takes. The Margrave of Brandenburg is to-day the arbiter of Europe; he pockets our provinces; he will adjudge Belgium to himself, you will see, one would say that we were working for Berlin; if this continue, and we do not put things in order, the French Revolution will have been made for the benefit of Potsdam, it will have accomplished for the sole result the aggrandizement of the little state of Frederick II., and we shall have killed the King of France for the sake of the King of Prussia."

And Danton burst into a terrible laugh.

Danton's laugh made Marat smile.

"You have each your hobby," said he. "Danton, yours is Prussia; Robespierre, yours is the Vendée. I am going to state facts in my turn. You do not perceive the real peril; it is this—the cafés and the gaming-houses.

The Café Choiseul is Jacobin; the Café Patin is Royalist; the Café Rendezvous attacks the National Guard; the Café of the Porte-Saint-Martin defends it; the Café de la Régence is against Brissot; the Café Corazza is for him, the Café Procope swears by Diderot, the Café of the Théâtre Français swears by Voltaire; at the Rotunde they tear up the assignats, at the Cafés Saint-Marceau are in a fury, the Café Manouri debates the question of flour, at the Café de Foy uproars and fisticuffs; at the Perron the hornets of the finance buzz. These are the matters which are serious."

Danton laughed no longer. Marat continued to smile. The smile of a dwarf is worse than the laugh of a giant.

"Do you sneer at yourself, Marat?" growled Danton.

Marat gave that convulsive movement of his hip which was celebrated. His smile died.

"Ah! I recognize you, Citizen Danton. It is indeed you who before the whole Convention spoke of me as 'the individual Marat.' Listen. I forgive you. We are playing the fool. Ah! I mock at myself! See, what have I done? I denounced Chazot, I denounced Pétion, I denounced Kersaint, I denounced Moreton, I denounced Dufriche-Valazé, I denounced Ligonnier, I denounced Menou, I denounced Banneville, I denounced Gensonné, I denounced Biron, I denounced Lidon and Chambon; was I mistaken? I smell treason in the traitor, and I find it best to denounce the criminal before he can commit his crime. I have the habit of saying in the evening that which you and others say on the following day. I am the man who proposed to the Assembly a perfect plan of criminal legislation. What have I done up to the present? I have asked for the instruction of the sections in order to discipline them for the Revolution, I have broken the seals of thirty-two boxes, I have reclaimed the diamonds deposited in the hands of Roland, I proved that the Brissotins gave to the Committee of General Safety blank warrants, I noted the omissions in the report of Lindal upon the crimes of Capet, I voted the torture of the tyrant during the twenty-four hours, I defended the battalions of Mauconseil and the Républicain, I prevented the reading of the letter of Narbonne and of Malhouet, I made a motion in favor of the wounded soldiers, I caused the suppression of the Commission of Six, I foresaw the treason of Dumouriez in the affair of Mons, I demanded the taking of a hundred thousand relatives of the refugees as hostages for the commissioners delivered to the enemy, I proposed to declare traitor any representative who should pass the barriers, I unmasked the Roland faction in the troubles at Marseilles, I insisted that a price should be set on the head of Égalité's son, I defended Bouchotte, I called for a nominal appeal in order to drive Isnard from the chair, I caused it to be declared that the Parisians had deserved well of the country; that is why I am called a dancing-puppet by Louvet, that is why Finisterre demands my expulsion, why the city of London desires that I should be exiled, the city of Amiens that I should be muzzled, why Coburg wishes me to be arrested, and Lecointe-Puyraveau proposes to the Convention to decree me mad. Ah, there! Citizen Danton, why did you ask me to come to your cabal if it were not to have my opinion? Did I ask to belong to it? far from it. I have no taste for tête-à-têtes with counter-revolutionists like Robespierre and you. For that matter, I ought to have known, that you would not understand me; you no more than Robespierre, Robespierre no more than you. So there is not a statesman here? You need to be taught to spell at politics, you must have the dot put over the i. What I said to you meant this: You both deceive yourselves. The danger is not in London, as Robespierre believes, nor in Berlin, as Danton believes; it is in Paris. It consists in the absence of unity, in the right of each one to pull on his own side, commencing with you two, in the blinding of minds, in the anarchy of wills . . ."

"Anarchy!" interrupted Danton, "who causes that, if not you?"

Marat did not pause.

"Robespierre, Danton, the danger is in this heap of cafés, in this mass of gaming-houses, this crowd of clubs, Clubs of the Blacks, the Federals, the Women, the Club of the Imperialists, which dates from Clermont-Tonnerre and which was the Monarchical club of 1790, a social circle conceived by the priest Claude Fauchet, the Club of the Woolen Caps, founded by the gazetteer Prudhomme, et cætera; without counting your Club of the Jacobins, Robespierre, and your Club of the Cordeliers, Danton. The danger comes from the famine, which caused the sack-porter Blin to hang to the lamp of the Hôtel de Ville the baker of the Palu market, François Denis, and in the justice, which hung the sack-porter Blin for having hanged the baker Denis. The danger is in the paper money, which the people depreciate. In the Rue du Temple an assignat of a hundred francs fell to the ground, and a passer-by, a man of the people, said, 'It is not worth the trouble of picking it up.' The stockbrokers and the monopolists, there is the danger. To have nailed the black flag to the Hôtel de Ville—a great advance! You arrest Baron Trenck, that is not sufficient. I want this old prison intriguer's neck wrung. You believe that you have got out of the difficulty because the President of the Convention puts a civic crown on the head of Labertèche, who received forty-one sabre cuts at Jemmapes, and of whom Chénier makes himself the elephant driver? Comedies and juggling! Ah, you will not look at Paris! You seek the danger at a distance, when it is close at hand! What is the use of your police, Robespierre? For you have your spies, Payan at the Commune, Coffinhal at the Revolutionary Tribunal, David at the Committee of General Safety, Couthon at the Committee of Public Well-being. You see that I know all about it. Very well, learn this: the danger is over your heads; the danger is under your feet; conspiracies, conspiracies, conspiracies; the people in the streets read the newspapers to one another and exchange nods; six thousand men, without civic papers, returned emigrants, Muscadins and Mathevons, are hidden in cellars and garrets and the wooden galleries of the Palais-Royal; people stand in a row at the bakers' shops; the women stand in the doorways and clasp their hands, crying: 'When shall we have peace?' You may shut yourselves up as close as you please in the hall of the Executive Council, in order to be alone, every word you speak is known; and as a proof, Robespierre, here are the words you spoke last night to Saint-Just: 'Barbaroux begins to show a fat paunch, it will be a trouble to him in his flight.' Yes, the danger is everywhere, and above all in the centre, in Paris. The 'ci-devants' plot, patriots go barefooted, the aristocrats arrested on the ninth of March are already at liberty; the fancy horses which ought to be harnessed to the frontier cannon spatter mud on us in the streets, a loaf of bread weighing four pounds costs three francs twelve sous, the theatres play indecent pieces, and Robespierre will presently have Danton guillotined."

"Oh, there, there!" said Danton.

Robespierre attentively studied the map.

"What is needed," cried Marat, abruptly, "is a dictator. Robespierre, you know that I want a dictator."

Robespierre raised his head.

"I know, Marat, you or me."

"Me or you," said Marat.

Danton grumbled between his teeth: "The dictatorship, only try it!"

Marat caught Danton's frown.

"Hold!" cried he. "One last effort. Let us get some agreement. The situation is worth the trouble. Did we not come to an agreement about the thirty-first of May? The whole question is a more serious one than that of Girondism, which was a question of detail. There is truth in what you say; but the truth, the whole truth, the real truth, is what I say. In the south, federalism; in the west, royalism; in Paris, the duel of the Convention and the Commune; on the frontiers, the backsliding of Custine and the treason of Dumouriez. What does all this signify? Dismemberment. What do we need? Unity. There is safety. But we must hasten. Paris must assume the government of the Revolution. If we lose an hour, to-morrow the Vendeans may be at Orleans, and the Prussians in Paris. I grant you this, Danton; I accord you that, Robespierre. So be it. Well, the conclusion, is a dictatorship. Let us seize the dictatorship. We three represent the Revolution. We are the three heads of Cerberus. Of these three heads, one speaks, that is you, Robespierre; one roars, that is you, Danton. . . ."

"The other bites," said Danton, "that is you, Marat."

"All three bite," said Robespierre.

There was silence. Then the dialogue, full of dark threats, recommenced.

"Listen, Marat, before entering into marriage, people should know each other. How did you learn what I said yesterday to Saint-Just?"

"That is my affair, Robespierre."

"Marat!"

"It is my duty to enlighten myself, and it is my business to inform myself."

"Marat!"

"I like to know things."

"Marat!"

"Robespierre, I know what you say to Saint-Just, as I know what Danton says to Lacroix; as I know what passes on the Quay of the Théatins, at the Hôtel Labriffe, the den where the nymphs of the emigration meet; as I know what happens in the house of the Thilles, near Gonesse, which belongs to Valmerange, former administrator of the post, where, since then, Maury and Cazalès have gone, where, since then, Sieyès and Verginaud have gone, and where, now, another, goes once a week."

In saying "another," Marat looked at Danton.

Danton cried:

"If I had two farthings' worth of power, this would be terrible."

Marat continued:

"I know what I am saying to you, Robespierre, just as I knew what was going on in the Temple tower when they fattened Louis XVI. there, so well that, the he-wolf, the she-wolf, and the cubs ate eighty-six baskets of peaches in the month of September alone. During that time the people were starving. I know that, as I know that Roland was hidden in a lodging looking on a back court, in the Rue de la Harpe; as I know that six hundred of the pikes of the fourteenth of July were manufactured by Faure, the Duke of Orleans' locksmith; as I know what they do in the house of Saint-Hilaire, the mistress of Sillery; on the days when there is to be a ball, it is old Sillery himself who chalks the floor of the yellow salon of the Rue Neuve-des-Mathurins; Buzot and Kersaint dined there. Saladin dined there on the twenty-seventh, and with whom, Robespierre? With your friend Lasource."

"Mere words," muttered Robespierre. "Lasource is not my friend."

And he added, thoughtfully:

"In the meanwhile there are in London eighteen manufactories of false assignats."

Marat went on in a voice still tranquil, though it had a slight tremulousness that was threatening:

"You are the faction of the All-Importants. Yes; I know everything, in spite of what Saint-Just calls 'the silence of State. . . .'"

Marat emphasized these last words, looked at Robespierre, and continued:

"I know what is said at your table the days when Lebas invites David to come and eat the dinner cooked by his betrothed, Elizabeth Duplay, your future sister-in-law, Robespierre. I am the far-seeing eye of the people, and, from the bottom of my cave, I watch. Yes, I see, yes, I hear, yes, I know. Little things content you. You admire yourselves. Robespierre poses to be contemplated by his Madame de Chalabre, the daughter of that Marquis de Chalabre who played whist with Louis XV. the evening Damiens was executed. Yes, heads are carried high. Saint-Just lives in a cravat; Legendre's dress is scrupulously correct, new frock-coat and white waistcoat, and a shirt-frill, to make people forget his apron. Robespierre imagines that history will be interested to know that he wore an olive-colored frock-coat à la Constituante, and a sky-blue dress-coat à la Convention. He had his portrait hanging on all the walls of his room. . . ."

Robespierre interrupted him in a voice even more composed than that of Marat's.

"And you, Marat, have yours in all the sewers."

They continued this style of conversation, in which the slowness of their voices emphasized the violence of the attacks and retorts, and added a certain irony to menace.

"Robespierre, you have called those who desire the overthrow of thrones, 'the Don Quixotes of the human race.'"

"And you, Marat, after the fourth of August, in No. 559 of The Friend of the People, ah! I have remembered the number, it may be useful, you demanded that the titles of the nobility should be restored to them. You said, 'A duke is always a duke.'"

"Robespierre, in the sitting of the seventh of December, you defended the woman Roland against Viard."

"Just as my brother defended you, Marat, when you were attacked at the Jacobin Club. What does that prove? nothing."

"Robespierre, we know the little room in the Tuileries where you said to Garat: 'I am tired of the Revolution!'"

"Marat, it was here, in this wine-shop, that, on the twenty-ninth of October, you embraced Barbaroux."

"Robespierre, you said to Buzot: 'The Republic! what is it?'"

"Marat, it was also in this wine-shop that you invited three Marseilles suspects to keep you company."

"Robespierre, you have yourself escorted by a stout fellow from the market, armed with a club."

"And you, Marat, on the eve of the tenth of August, you asked Buzot to help you flee to Marseilles, disguised as a jockey."

"During the prosecutions of September, you hid yourself, Robespierre."

"And you, Marat, you showed yourself."

"Robespierre, you flung the red cap on the ground."

"Yes, when a traitor hoisted it. That which decorates Dumouriez sullies Robespierre."

"Robespierre, you refused to cover Louis XVI.'s head with a veil while Chateauvieux's soldiers were passing."

"I did better than veil his head, I cut it off."

Danton interposed, but it was like oil flung upon flames.

"Robespierre, Marat," said he, "calm yourselves."

Marat did not like being named the second. He turned about.

"With what does Danton meddle?" asked he.

Danton bounded.

"With what do I meddle? With this! That we must not have fratricide; that there must be no strife between two men who serve the people; that it is enough to have a civil war, and that it would be too much to have a domestic war; that it is I who have made the Revolution, and that I will not permit it to be spoiled. Now you know what it is I meddle with!"

Marat replied, without raising his voice:

"You had better be getting your accounts ready."

"My accounts!" cried Danton. "Go ask for them in the defiles of Argonne, in Champagne delivered, in Belgium conquered, of the armies where I have already four times offered my breast to the musket-shots! Go demand them at the Place de la Revolution, at the scaffold of January the twenty-first, of the throne flung to the ground, of the guillotine, that widow . . ."

Marat interrupted Danton.

"The guillotine is a virgin; one sleeps upon her, she does not give birth."

"Are you sure?" retorted Danton. "I tell you I will make her fruitful."

"We shall see," said Marat.

And he smiled.

Danton saw this smile.

"Marat," cried he, "you are the man that hides, I am the man of the open air and broad day. I hate the life of a reptile. It would not suit me to be a wood-louse. You inhabit a cave; I live in a street. You hold communication with none; whosoever passes may see and speak with me."

"Pretty boy, will you mount up to where I live?" snarled Marat.

And, no longer smiling, he continued in a peremptory tone:

"Danton, give an account of the thirty-three thousand crowns, ready money, that Montmorin paid you in the king's name under pretext of indemnifying you for your post of solicitor at the Châtelet."

"I made the fourteenth of July," said Danton, haughtily.

"And the store-room? and the crown diamonds?"

"I made the sixth of October."

"And the thefts of your alter ego, Lacroix, in Belgium?"

"I made the twentieth of June."

"And the loans to the Montansier?"

"I urged the people on to the return from Varennes."

"And the opera-house, built with money that you furnished?"

"I armed the sections of Paris."

"And the hundred thousand livres, secret funds of the Ministry of Justice?"

"I caused the tenth of August."

"And the two millions for the Assembly's secret expenses, of which you took one-fourth?"

"I stopped the enemy on their march, and barred the passage to the kings in coalition."

"Prostitute!" said Marat.

Danton was terrible as he rose to his full height.

"Yes!" cried he, "I am a public woman, I sold my body, but I saved the world!"

Robespierre had gone back to biting his nails. As for him, he could neither laugh nor smile. The laugh, the lightning, of Danton, and the smile, the sting, of Marat, were both wanting in him.

Danton resumed:

"I am like the ocean; I have my ebb and my flow; at low water my shoals may be seen; at high tide you may see my waves."

"Your foam," said Marat.

"My tempest," said Danton.

Marat had risen with Danton. He also burst forth. The snake suddenly became a dragon.

"Ah!" cried he. "Ah! Robespierre! Ah! Danton! you will not listen to me! Well, I tell you, you are lost. Your policy ends in an impossibility to go farther; you have no longer an outlet; and you do things which shut every door against you, except that of the tomb."

"That is our grandeur," said Danton.

And he shrugged his shoulders.

Marat hurried on:

"Danton, beware. Verginaud also had a wide mouth, thick lips, and frowning eyebrows; Verginaud was pitted too, like Mirabeau and like thee, that did not prevent the thirty-first of May. Ah! you shrug your shoulders. Sometimes a shrug of the shoulders makes the head fall. Danton, I tell thee, that big voice, that loose cravat, those top-boots, those little suppers, those great pockets, all those are things which concern Louisette."

Louisette was Marat's pet name for the guillotine.

He continued:

"And as for thee, Robespierre, thou art a Moderate, but that will serve thee nothing. Go on, powder thyself, dress thy hair, brush thy clothes, play the vulgar coxcomb, have clean linen, keep curled and frizzed and bedizened, none the less thou wilt go to the Place de la Grève, read Brunswick's proclamation! thou wilt get a treatment no better than that of the regicide Damiens, fine as thou art, thou wilt be dragged at the tails of four horses."

"Echo of Coblentz!" said Robespierre between his teeth.

"Robespierre, I am the echo of nothing, I am the cry of the whole. Ah, thou art young, thou! How old art thou, Danton? thirty-four. How old art thou, Robespierre? thirty-three. Well, I—I have lived always, I am the old human suffering, I have lived six thousand years."

"That is true," retorted Danton. "For six thousand years, Cain has been preserved in hatred like the toad in a rock, the rock breaks, Cain springs out among men, and is called Marat."

"Danton!" cried Marat, and a livid glare lit up his eyes.

"Well, what?" asked Danton.

Thus these three terrible men conversed. They were conflicting thunderbolts.

III.

A STIRRING OF THE INMOST NERVES

There was a pause in the dialogue; these titans withdrew for a moment each into his own thoughts.

Lions dread hydras. Robespierre had grown very pale and Danton very red. A shiver ran through both. The wild-beast glare in Marat's eyes had died out; a calm, cold and imperious, settled again on the face of this man, dreaded by his formidable associates.

Danton felt himself conquered, but he would not yield. He resumed:

"Marat talks very loud about the dictatorship and unity, but he has only one ability, that of breaking to pieces."

Robespierre parted his thin lips, and said:

"As for me, I am of the opinion of Anacharsis Cloots; I say: Neither Roland, nor Marat."

"And I," replied Marat, "I say: Neither Danton, nor Robespierre."

He looked at both fixedly, and added:

"Let me give you some advice, Danton. You are in love, you think of marrying again, do not meddle any more with politics, be wise."

And moving backward a step toward the door as if to go out, he gave them this sinister salutation:

"Adieu, messieurs."

Danton and Robespierre shuddered.

At this instant a voice rose from the bottom of the room, saying:

"You are wrong, Marat."

All turned. During Marat's explosion, and unperceived, some one had entered by the door at the end of the room.

"It is you, Citizen Cimourdain," said Marat. "Good-day."

It was indeed Cimourdain.

"I say you are wrong, Marat," repeated he.

Marat turned green, which was his way of growing pale.

Cimourdain added:

"You are useful, but Robespierre and Danton are necessary. Why threaten them? Union, union, citizens! The people expect unity."

This entrance acted like a dash of cold water, and had the effect that the arrival of a stranger does on a family quarrel, it calmed the surface, if not the depths.

Cimourdain advanced toward the table.

Danton and Robespierre knew him. They had often remarked among the public tribunals of the Convention this obscure but powerful man whom the people saluted. Nevertheless, Robespierre, always formal, asked :

"Citizen, how did you enter?"

"He belongs to the Évêché," replied Marat, in a voice in which a certain submission was perceptible. Marat braved the Convention, led the Commune, and feared the Évêché.

This is a law.

Mirabeau felt Robespierre stirring at some unknown depth below, Robespierre felt Marat stir, Marat felt Hébert stir, Hébert felt Babeuf. As long as the underneath layers are still, the politician can advance; but under the most revolutionary there must be some subsoil, and the boldest stop in dismay when they feel under their feet the earthquake they have created over their heads.

To be able to distinguish the movement caused by covetousness from that brought about by principle, to combat the one and second the other, that is the genius and the virtue of great revolutionists.

Danton saw that Marat faltered.

"Oh! Citizen Cimourdain is not one too many," said he.

And he held out his hand to the newcomer.

Then:

"Parbleu," said he. "Explain the situation to Citizen Cimourdain. He appears just at the right moment. I represent the Mountain, Robespierre represents the Committee of Public Safety, Marat represents the Commune, Cimourdain represents the Évêché. He is come to give the casting vote."

"So be it," said Cimourdain, simply and gravely. "What is the matter in question?"

"The Vendée," replied Robespierre.

"The Vendée!" repeated Cimourdain.

Then he continued:

"There is the great danger. If the Revolution perish, she will perish by the Vendée. One Vendée is more formidable than ten Germanies. In order that France may live, it is necessary to kill the Vendée."

These few words won him Robespierre.

Robespierre asked this question, "Were you not formerly a priest?"

Cimourdain's priestly air did not escape Robespierre. He recognized in another that which he had within himself.

Cimourdain replied:

"Yes, citizen."

"What difference does that make?" cried Danton. "When priests are good fellows, they are worth more than others. In revolutionary times, priests melt into citizens, as the bells do into sous and cannon. Danjou is a priest, Daunou is a priest. Thomas Lindet is the Bishop of Évreux. Robespierre, you sit in the Convention side by side with Massieu, Bishop of Beauvais. The Grand-Vicar Vaugeois was a member of the Insurrection Committee of the Tenth of August. Chabot is a Capuchin. It was Dom Gerle who devised the Tennis-court Oath; it was the Abbé Audran who caused the National Assembly to be declared superior to the king; it was the Abbé Goutte who demanded of the Legislature that the dais should be taken away from the arm-chair of Louis XVI.; it was the Abbé Grégoire who instigated the abolition of royalty."

"Seconded," sneered Marat, "by the actor Collot-d'Herbois. Between them, they did the work; the priest overturned the throne, the comedian flung down the king."

"Let us get back to the Vendée," said Robespierre.

"Well," asked Cimourdain, "what is it? What is this Vendée doing now?"

Robespierre answered:

"This. She has found a chief. She becomes terrible."

"Who is this chief, Citizen Robespierre?"

"A ci-devant Marquis de Lantenac, who styles himself a Prince of Brittany."

Cimourdain started.

"I know him," said he. "I was chaplain in his house."

He thought for a moment, and added:

"He was a man of gallantry before being a soldier."

"Like Biron, who was a Lauzun," said Danton.

And Cimourdain continued, thoughtfully:

"Yes, an old man of pleasure. He must be terrible."

"Frightful," said Robespierre. "He burns the villages, kills the wounded, massacres the prisoners, shoots the women."

"The women?"

"Yes. Among others he had the mother of three children shot. Nobody knows what became of the little ones. However, he is a captain. He understands war."

"Yes, in truth," replied Cimourdain. "He was in the Hanoverian war, and the soldiers said: Richelieu at the surface, Lantenac at the bottom. Lantenac was the real general. Talk about him to your colleague, Dussaulx."

Robespierre remained silent for a moment, then the dialogue began anew between him and Cimourdain.

"Well, Citizen Cimourdain, this man is in the Vendée."

"Since when?"

"The last three weeks."

"He must be declared an outlaw."

"That is done."

"A price must be set on his head."

"It is done."

"A large reward must be offered to whoever will take him."

"That is done."

"Not in assignats."

"That is done."

"In gold."

"That is done."

"And he must be guillotined."

"That will be done."

"By whom?"

"By you."

"By me?"

"Yes, you will be delegated by the Committee of Public Safety, with unlimited powers."

"I accept," said Cimourdain.

Robespierre made his choice of men rapidly; the quality of a true statesman. He took from the portfolio before him a sheet of white paper, on which could be read this printed heading: "The French Republic One and Indivisible. Committee of Public Safety."

Cimourdain continued:

"Yes, I accept. The terrible against the terrible. Lantenac is ferocious, I shall be so. War to the death against this man. I will deliver the Republic from him, please God."

He checked himself, then resumed:

"I am a priest; no matter, I believe in God."

"God has gone out of date," said Danton.

"I believe in God," said Cimourdain, unmoved.

Robespierre gave a sinister nod of approval.

Cimourdain asked: "To whom am I delegated?"

"To the commandant of the exploring division sent against Lantenac. Only, I warn you, he is a nobleman."

Danton cried out:

"That is another thing which matters little. A noble! Well, what then? It is with the nobles as with the priests. When one of either class is good, he is excellent. Nobility is a prejudice; but we should not have it in one sense more than the other; no more against than in favor of it. Robespierre, is not Saint-Just a noble? Florelle de Saint-Just, zounds! Anacharsis Cloots is a baron. Our friend Charles Hesse, who never misses a meeting of the Cordeliers, is a prince, and the brother of the reigning Landgrave of Hesse-Rothenburg. Montaut, the intimate of Marat, is the Marquis de Montaut. There is in the Revolutionary Tribunal a juror who is a priest, Vilate, and a juror who is a nobleman, Leroy, Marquis de Montflabert. Both are tried men."

"And you forget," added Robespierre, "the foreman of the revolutionary jury. . . ."

"Antonelle?"

"Who is the Marquis Antonelle," said Robespierre.

Danton replied:

"Dampierre was a nobleman, the one who lately got himself killed before Condé for the Republic, and Beaurepaire was a noble, he who blew out his brains, rather than open the gates of Verdun to the Prussians."

"All of which," grumbled Marat, "does not alter the fact that on the day Condorcet said: 'The Gracchi were nobles,' Danton called out to Condorcet: 'All nobles are traitors, beginning with Mirabeau and ending with thee.'"

Cimourdain's grave voice made itself heard:

"Citizen Danton, Citizen Robespierre, you are perhaps right in trusting, but the people distrust them, and the people are not wrong in so doing. When a priest is charged with the surveillance of a nobleman, the responsibility is doubled, and it is necessary for the priest to be inflexible."

"True," said Robespierre.

Cimourdain added, "And inexorable."

Robespierre replied:

"It is well said, Citizen Cimourdain. You will have to deal with a young man. You will have the ascendency over him, being double his age. It will be necessary to direct him, but he must be carefully managed. It appears that he possesses military talent, all the reports are unanimous as to that. He belongs to a corps which has been detached from the Army of the Rhine to go into the Vendée. He arrives from the frontier, where he was noticeable for intelligence and courage. He leads the exploring column in a superior way. For fifteen days he has held the old Marquis de Lantenac in check. He restrains and drives him before him. He will end by forcing him to the sea and tumbling him headlong into it. Lantenac has the cunning of an old general, and the audacity of a youthful captain. This young man has already enemies and those who are envious of him. The Adjutant-General Léchelle is jealous of him."

"That L'Échelle wants to be commander-in-chief," interrupted Danton, "there is nothing in his favor but a pun: 'It needs Léchelle (a ladder) to mount into Charette (a cart.') All the same. Charette beats him."

"And he is not willing," pursued Robespierre, "that anybody besides himself should beat Lantenac. The misfortune of the Vendean war is in such rivalries. Heroes badly commanded, that is what our soldiers are. A simple captain of hussars, Chambon, enters Saumur with trumpets playing Ca ira; he takes Saumur; he could keep on and take Cholet, but he has no orders, so he halts. All those commands of the Vendée must be remodeled. The regiments are spread out, the forces dispersed; an army scattered is an army paralyzed; it is a rock crumbled into dust. At the camp of Paramé there are no longer any tents. There are a hundred useless little companies posted between Tréguier and Dinan of which a division might be formed that could guard the whole coast. Léchelle, supported by Parrein, strips the northern coast under pretext of protecting the southern, and so opens France to the English. A half-million peasants in revolt and a descent of England upon France, that is Lantenac's plan. The young commander of the exploring column presses his sword against Lantenac's loins, keeps it there, and beats him without Léchelle's permission; now Léchelle is his general; so Léchelle denounces him.

Opinions are divided in regard to this young man. Léchelle wants to have him shot. The Prieur de la Marne wants to make him adjutant-general."

"This youth," said Cimourdain, "appears to me to possess great qualities."

"But he has one fault!"

The interruption came from Marat.

"What is it?" asked Cimourdain.

"Clemency," said Marat.

And Marat added:

"He is firm in battle, and weak afterward. He shows indulgence, he pardons, he grants mercy, he protects devotees and nuns, he saves the wives and daughters of aristocrats, he releases prisoners, he sets priests free."

"A grave fault," murmured Cimourdain.

"A crime," said Marat.

"Sometimes," said Danton.

"Often," said Robespierre.

"Almost always," chimed in Marat.

"When one has to deal with the enemies of the country, always," said Cimourdain.

Marat turned toward Cimourdain.

"And what, then, would you do with a Republican chief who set a Royalist chief at liberty?"

"I should be of Léchelle's opinion; I would have him shot."

"Or guillotined," said Marat.

"He might have his choice," said Cimourdain.

Danton began to laugh.

"I like one as well as the other."

"Thou art sure to have one or the other," growled Marat.

His glance left Danton and settled again on Cimourdain.

"So, Citizen Cimourdain, if a Republican leader were to falter, you would cut off his head?"

"Within twenty-four hours."

"Well," said Marat, "I am of Robespierre's opinion, Citizen Cimourdain ought to be sent as commissioner-delegate of the Committee of Public Safety to the commandant of the exploring division of the army of the coast. How is it you call this commandant?"

Robespierre answered, "He is a ci-devant noble."

And he began to turn over the papers.

"Get the priest to guard the nobleman," said Danton. "I distrust a priest when he is alone; I distrust a noble when he is alone; when they are together, I do not fear for them; one watches the other, and they do well."

The indignant look always on Cimourdain's face grew deeper; but, without doubt, finding the remark just at the bottom, he did not look at Danton, but said in his stern voice:

"If the Republican commander who is confided to me makes one false step, the penalty will be death."

Robespierre, with his eyes on the portfolio, said:

"Here is the name, Citizen Cimourdain. The commandant, in regard to whom full powers will be granted you, is a ci-devant vicomte. His name is Gauvain."

Cimourdain turned pale.

"Gauvain!" cried he.

Marat saw the sudden pallor of Cimourdain.

"The Vicomte Gauvain!" repeated Cimourdain.

"Yes," said Robespierre.

"Well?" said Marat, his eyes fixed on the priest.

There was a brief silence. Marat continued:

"Citizen Cimourdain, on the conditions named by yourself, do you accept the mission as delegated commissioner to the Commandant Gauvain? Is it decided?"

"It is decided," replied Cimourdain.

He grew paler and paler.

Robespierre took the pen which lay near him, wrote in his slow, even hand, four lines on the sheet of paper which bore the heading: COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC SAFETY, signed, and passed the sheet and the pen to Danton;

Danton signed, and Marat, whose eyes had not left Cimourdain's livid face, signed after Danton.

Robespierre took the paper again, dated it, and gave it to Cimourdain, who read:

"YEAR II. OF THE REPUBLIC.

"Full powers are granted to Citizen Cimourdain, delegated Commissioner of Public Safety to the Citizen Gauvain, commanding the Exploring Division of the Army of the Coasts.

"ROBESPIERRE,—DANTON,—MARAT."

And beneath the signatures:

"The twenty-eighth June, 1793."

The revolutionary calendar, called the Civil Calendar, had no legal existence at this time, and was not adopted by the Convention, on the motion of Romme, until October fifth, 1793.

While Cimourdain read, Marat watched him.

Marat said in a low voice, as if talking to himself: "It will be necessary to have all this formalized by a decree of the Convention, or a special warrant of the Committee of Public Safety. There remains something yet to be done."

"Citizen Cimourdain, where do you live?" asked Robespierre.

"Cour du Commerce."

"Hold! so do I, too," said Danton; "you are my neighbor."

Robespierre continued :

"There is not a moment to lose. To-morrow you will receive your commission in form, signed by all the members of the Committee of Public Safety. This is a confirmation of the commission. It will accredit you in a special manner to the acting representatives, Philippeaux, Prieur de la Marne, Lecointre, Alquier, and the others. We know you. Your powers are unlimited. You can make Gauvain a general or send him to the scaffold. You will receive your commission to-morrow at three o'clock. When will you set out?"

"At four," said Cimourdain.

And they separated.

As he entered his house, Marat informed Simonne Évrard that he should go to the Convention on the morrow.

BOOK THREE

THE CONVENTION

I.

THE CONVENTION

I.

We approach the grand summit.

Behold the Convention.

The gaze grows steady in presence of this height.

Never has a more lofty spectacle appeared on the horizon of mankind.

There is one Himalaya and there is one Convention.

The Convention is perhaps the culminating point of history.

During its lifetime, for it lived, men did not quite understand what it was. It was precisely the grandeur which escaped its contemporaries; they were too much frightened to be dazzled. Everything grand possesses a sacred horror. To admire mediocrities and hills, that is easy; but whatever is too lofty, whether it be a genius or a mountain, an assembly as well as a masterpiece, alarms when seen too near. An immense heïght appears an exaggeration. It is fatiguing to climb. One loses one's breath at the steep rises, one slips down declivities, one is hurt by sharp, rugged heights which are in themselves beautiful; torrents by their foaming reveal the nearness of the precipices; clouds hide the mountain-tops; a sudden ascent terrifies as much as a fall. Hence there is a greater sensation of fright than admiration. What one feels is fantastic enough, an aversion to the grand. One sees the abyss and loses sight of the sublimity; one sees the monster and does not perceive the marvel. Thus the Convention was at first judged. It was measured by the purblind, it, which should have been looked at by eagles.

To-day we see it in perspective, and it throws across the deep and distant heavens, against a background at once serene and tragic, the immense profile of the French Revolution.

II.

The fourteenth of July delivered.

The tenth of August thundered.

The twenty-first of September founded.

The twenty-first of September was the equinox, the equilibrium. Libra. The balance. It was, according to Romme, under this sign of Equality and Justice, that the Republic was proclaimed. A constellation heralded it.

The Convention is the first avatar of the people. It was by the Convention that the grand new leaf was turned and the future of to-day commenced.

Every idea must have a visible enfolding, a habitation is necessary to any principle; a church is God between four walls, every dogma must have a temple. When the Convention became a fact, the first problem to be solved was how to lodge the Convention.

At first the Manége, then the Tuileries, was taken. A platform was raised, scenery arranged, a great gray painting by David imitating bass-reliefs, symmetrical benches, a square tribune, parallel pilasters with plinths like blocks and long rectilinear stems; square inclosures into which the spectators crowded and which were called the public tribunes, a Roman velarium, Grecian draperies, and in these right angles and these straight lines the Convention was installed; a tempest confined within a geometrical plan. On the tribune, the Red Cap was painted in gray. The Royalists began by laughing at this gray red cap, this unsuitable hall, this monument of pasteboard, this sanctuary of papier-maché, this Pantheon of mud and spittle. How quickly it would disappear! The columns were made of the staves from hogsheads, the arches were of deal boards, the bass-reliefs of mastic, the entablatures were of pine, the statues of plaster, the marbles were painted, the walls canvas; and of this provisional shelter France has made an eternal dwelling.

When the Convention began to hold its sessions in the Manége, the walls were covered with the placards which filled Paris at the time of the return from Varennes. On one might be read: The king returns. Any person who cheers him shall be beaten, any person who insults him shall be imprisoned. On another: Peace! Hats on heads. He is about to pass before his judges. On another: The king has aimed at the nation. He has hung fire. It is now the nation's turn. On another: The Law ! The Law ! It was within those walls that the Convention sat in judgment on Louis XVI.

At the Tuileries, where the Convention began to sit on the tenth of May, 1793, and which was called the Palais-National, the assembly hall occupied the whole space between the Pavillon de l'Horloge, called the Pavilion of Unity, and the Pavillon Marsan, then named the Pavilion of Liberty. The Pavilion of Flora was called Pavilion of Equality. The hall was reached by the grand staircase of Jean Bullant. The whole ground-floor of the palace, beneath the story occupied by the Assembly, was a kind of long guard-room, littered with bundles and camp-beds of the armed troops who kept watch about the Convention. The Assembly had a guard of honor styled "the Grenadiers of the Convention."

A tricolored ribbon separated the palace where the Assembly sat from the garden in which the people came and went.

III.

Let us finish the description of that assembly hall. Everything which concerns this terrible place is interesting.

That which first met the eye of anyone entering was a great statue of Liberty placed between two wide windows.

One hundred and thirty feet in length; thirty-four feet in width; thirty-six feet in height, such were the dimensions of this room, which had been the king's theatre and which became the theatre of the Revolution. The elegant and magnificent hall built by Vigarani for the courtiers, was hidden by the rude timber-work which in '93 supported the weight of the people. This framework, whereon the public tribunes were erected, had, a detail deserving notice, one single beam for its only point of support. This beam was in one piece, with a span of thirty-four feet. Few caryatides have labored like that beam; it supported for years the rude pressure of the Revolution. It sustained applause, enthusiasm, insolence, noise, tumult, riot, the immense chaos of opposing rages. It did not give way. After the Convention, it witnessed the Council of the Ancients. The eighteenth Brumaire relieved it.

Percier then replaced the wooden beam by columns of marble, which did not last so well.

The models chosen by architects are sometimes strange; the architect of the Rue de Rivoli took for his model the trajectory of a cannon-ball; the architect of Carlsruhe, a fan; a gigantic drawer would seem to have been the model of the architect who built the hall where the Convention began to sit on the tenth of May, 1793; it was long, high, and flat. At one of the sides of the parallelogram was a great semicircle; this amphitheatre contained the seats of the representatives, but without tables or desks; Garan-Coulon, who wrote a great deal, held his paper on his knee; in front of the seats was the tribune; before the tribune, the bust of Lepelletier-Saint-Fargeau; behind the tribune, the arm-chair of the President.

The head of the bust reached a little above the ledge of the tribune; for which reason it was afterward moved away from that position.

The amphitheatre was composed of nineteen semicircular rows of benches, rising one behind the other; the supports of the seats prolonging the amphitheatre into the two corners.

Below, in the horse-shoe at the foot of the tribune, the ushers had their places.

On one side of the tribune, fastened to the wall, was a placard nine feet high, in a black wooden frame, bearing on two pages, separated by a sort of sceptre, the "Declaration of the Rights of Man"; on the other side, was a vacant space, occupied at a later period by a similar frame, containing the Constitution of the Year II., with the pages separated by a sword. Above the tribune, over the head of the orator, from a deep loggia with double compartments always filled with people, floated three immense tricolored flags, almost horizontal, resting on an altar upon which could be read these words: THE LAW. Behind this altar there arose, like the sentinel of free speech, tall as a column, an enormous Roman fasces. Colossal statues, erect against the wall, faced the representatives. The President had Lycurgus on his right hand and Solon on his left; Plato towered above the Mountain.

These statues had plain blocks of wood for pedestals, resting on a long cornice which encircled the hall and separated the people from the assembly. The spectators could lean their elbows on this cornice.

The black wooden frame of the proclamation of the Rights of Man reached to the cornice and broke the regularity of the entablature, an infraction of the straight line to which Chabot objected. "It is ugly," said he to Vadier.

On the heads of the statues alternated crowns of oak-leaves and laurel.

A green drapery, on which similar crowns were painted in a deeper green, fell in heavy folds straight down from the surrounding cornice, and covered the whole wall of the ground-floor occupied by the Assembly. Above this drapery the wall was white and naked. In this wall, as if hollowed out by a gigantic axe, were two stories of public tribunes, without moulding or foliage, the lower ones square, the upper ones round; according to rule, for Vitruve was not yet dethroned, the archivolts were superimposed upon the architraves. There were ten tribunes on each side of the hall, and two huge loggia at either end; in all, twenty-four. There the crowds gathered.

The spectators in the lower tribunes, overflowing their borders, grouped themselves along the reliefs of the cornice. A long iron bar, firmly fixed at the point of support, served as a rail to the upper tribunes, and guarded the spectators against the pressure of the throngs mounting the stairs. Nevertheless, a man was once thrown headlong into the Assembly, he fell partly upon Massieu, Bishop of Beauvais, and thus was not killed, he said: "Hullo! why a bishop is really good for something!"

The hall of the Convention could hold two thousand persons comfortably, and, on the days of insurrection, it held three.

The Convention held two sittings, one in the daytime, one in the evening.

The back of the president's chair was curved and studded with gilt nails. The table was upheld by four, single-footed, winged monsters, one might have thought they had come out of the Apocalypse to assist at the Revolution. They seemed to have been unharnessed from Ezekiel's chariot to drag the tumbril of Samson.

On the president's table was a huge hand-bell, almost large enough to have served for a church, a great copper inkstand, and a parchment folio, which was the book of official reports.

Many times freshly severed heads, borne aloft on the tops of pikes, sprinkled their blood-drops over this table.

The tribune was reached by a staircase of nine steps. These steps were high, steep, and hard to mount; one day Gensonné stumbled as he was going up. "It is a scaffold ladder!" said he.—"Serve your apprenticeship," cried Carrier to him.

In the angles of the hall, where the wall had looked too bare, the architect had put Roman fasces for decorations, with the axes turned to the people.

At the right and left of the tribune were pedestals supporting two candelabra twelve feet in height, having each four pairs of lamps. There was a similar candelabrum in each public box. On the pedestals of these candelabra were carved circles which the people called "guillotine-collars."

The benches of the Assembly reached almost to the cornice of the tribunes; the representatives and the spectators could talk to one another.

The exits from the tribunes led into a labyrinth of sombre corridors, often filled with a savage din.

The Convention overcrowded the palace, and flowed into the neighboring hôtels, the Hôtel de Longueville and the Hôtel de Coigny. It was to the Hôtel de Coigny, if one may believe a letter of Lord Bradford's, that the royal furniture was carried after the tenth of August. It took two months to empty the Tuileries.

The committees were lodged in the neighborhood of the hall; in the Pavilion of Equality were those of Legislation, Agriculture, and Commerce; in the Pavilion of Liberty were the Marine, the Colonies, Finance, Assignats, and Public Safety; the War Department was at the Pavilion of Unity.

The Committee of General Security communicated directly with that of Public Safety by a dark passage, lighted day and night with a reflector lamp, where the spies of all parties came and went. People spoke there in whispers.

The bar of the Convention was moved several times. Generally it was at the right of the president.

At the far ends of the hall the vertical partitions which closed the concentric semicircles of the amphitheatre left between them and the wall a couple of narrow, deep passages, from which opened two dark square doors. These were both the entrances and exits.

The representatives entered directly into the hall by a door opening on the Terrace des Feuillants.

This hall, dimly lighted during the day by deep-set windows, took a strange nocturnal aspect when, with the approach of twilight, it was badly illuminated by lamps. Their pale glare intensified the evening shadows; the lamplight sessions were dismal. It was impossible to see clearly; from the opposite ends of the hall, to the right and to the left, indistinct groups of faces insulted each other. People met without recognizing one another.

One day Laiguelot, hurrying toward the tribune, hit against some person in the sloping passage. "Pardon, Robespierre," said he.—"For whom do you take me?" replied a hoarse voice.—"Pardon, Marat," said Laiguelot.

At the bottom, to the right and left of the president, were two reserved tribunes; for, strange to say, the Convention had its privileged spectators. These tribunes were the only ones that had draperies. In the middle of the architrave two gold tassels held up the curtains. The tribunes of the people were bare.

The whole surroundings were harsh and savage, regular. Regularity in barbarism is rather a type of revolution. The hall of the Convention offered the most complete specimen of what artists have since called "architecture Messidor." It was massive and frail. The builders of that time mistook symmetry for beauty. The last word of the Renaissance had been uttered under Louis XV., and a reaction followed. The noble was pushed to insipidity, and the pure to absurdity. Prudery may exist in architecture. After the dazzling orgies of form and color of the eighteenth century, Art took to fasting, and allowed herself only the straight line. This sort of progress ends in ugliness. Art reduced to a skeleton is the phenomenon which results. The fault of this sort of wisdom and abstinence is that the style is so severe that it becomes meagre.

Outside of all political emotion, there was something in the very architecture of this hall which made one shiver. One confusedly recalled the old theatre with its garlanded boxes, its blue and crimson ceiling, its prismed lustres, its girandoles with diamond reflections, its brilliant hangings, its profusion of cupids and nymphs on the curtain and draperies, the whole royal and amorous idyl, painted, sculptured and gilded, which had brightened this sombre spot with its smile, where one now saw on every side hard rectilinear angles, cold and sharp as steel; it was something like Boucher guillotined by David.

IV.

When one saw the Assembly, the hall was forgotten. Whosoever looked at the drama no longer remembered the theatre. Nothing more chaotic and more sublime. A crowd of heroes, a mob of cowards. Fallow deer on a mountain, reptiles in a marsh. Therein swarmed, elbowed one another, provoked one another, threatened one another, struggled and lived, all those combatants who to-day are phantoms.

A convocation of Titans.

To the right, the Gironde, a legion of thinkers; to the left, the Mountain, a group of athletes. On one side Brissot, who had received the keys of the Bastile; Barbaroux, whom the Marseilles troops obeyed; Kervélégan, who had under his hand the battalion of Brest garrisoned in the Faubourg Saint-Marceau; Gensonné, who had established the supremacy of the representatives over the generals; the fatal Gaudet, to whom, one night at the Tuileries, the queen had showed the sleeping Dauphin; Gaudet kissed the forehead of the child and caused the head of the father to fall. Sallez, the crack-brained denouncer of the intimacy between the Mountain and Austria; Sillery, the cripple of the Right, as Couthon was the paralytic of the Left. Lause-Duperret, who, having been called scoundrel by a journalist, invited him to dinner, saying: "I know that by 'scoundrel' you simply mean a man who does not think like yourself." Rabaut-Saint-Étienne, who commenced his Almanac for 1790 with these words: "The Revolution is ended." Quinette, one of those who overthrew Louis XVI.; the Jansenist Camus, who drew up the civil constitution of the clergy, believed in the miracles of Deacon Pâris, and prostrated himself each night before a figure of Christ seven feet high, which was nailed to the wall of his chamber; Fauchet, a priest, who, with Camille Desmoulins, brought about the Fourteenth of July; Isnard, who committed the crime of saying: "Paris will be destroyed" at the same moment when Brunswick was saying: "Paris shall be burned;" Jacob Dupont, the first who cried "I am an atheist," and to whom Robespierre replied: "Atheism is aristocratic." Lanjuinais, a stern, sagacious, and valiant Breton leader; Ducos, the Euryales of Boyer-Fonfrède; Rebecqui, the Pylades of Barbaroux; Rebecqui handed in his resignation because Robespierre had not yet been guillotined; Richaud, who combated the permanency of the Sections; Lasource, who had given utterance to the murderous apophthegm: "Woe to grateful nations!" and who was afterward to contradict himself at the foot of the scaffold by this haughty sarcasm flung at the Montagnards: "We die because the people sleep, and you will die because the people will awake;" Biroteau, who caused the abolition of inviolability to be decreed, was also, without knowing it, the forger of the axe, and raised the scaffold for himself; Charles Villatte, who sheltered his conscience behind this protest: "I will not vote under the axes;" Louvet, the author of Faublas, who was to end as a bookseller in the Palais-Royal, with Lodoïska behind the counter; Mercier, author of the Picture of Paris, who exclaimed: "On the Twenty-first of January, all kings felt for the backs of their necks!" Marec, whose anxiety was "the faction of the ancient limits." The journalist Carra, who, at the foot of the scaffold, said to the headsman: "It bores me to die. I would have liked to see the continuation;" Vigée, who called himself a grenadier of the second battalion of Mayenne-et-Loire, and who, when menaced by the public tribunals, cried: "I demand that at the first murmur of the tribunals we all withdraw and march on Versailles, sabre in hand!" Buzot, reserved for death by famine; Valazé, destined to die by his own dagger; Condorcet, who was to perish at Bourg-la-Reine, known as Bourg-Égalité, betrayed by the Horace which he had in his pocket; Pétion, whose destiny was to be adored by the crowd in 1792 and devoured by wolves in 1794; still twenty others, Pontécoulant, Marboz, Lidon, Saint-Martin, Dussaulx, the translator of Juvenal, who had been in the Hanover campaign; Boilleau, Bertrand, Lesterp-Beauvais, Lesage, Gomaire, Gardien, Mainvieille, Duplantier, Lacaze, Antiboul, and at their head a Barnave, who was styled Vergniaud.

On the other side, Antoine-Louis-Léon Florelle de Saint-Just, pale, with a low forehead, a regular profile, eye mysterious, a profound sadness, aged twenty-three; Merlin de Thionville, whom the Germans called Feuerteufel, "the fire-devil"; Merlin de Douai, the culpable author of the Law of the Suspected; Soubran, whom the people of Paris, at the first Prairial, demanded for a general. The ancient priest Lebon, holding a sabre in the hand which had sprinkled holy water; Billaud-Varennes, who foresaw the magistracy of the future; no judges, no arbiters; Fabre d'Églantine, who fell upon a delightful Godsend, the Republican Calendar, just as Rouget de Lisle had a sublime inspiration, La Marseillaise, neither one nor the other ever produced a second; Manuel, the attorney of the Commune, who had said: "A dead king is not a man less;" Goujon, who had entered Tripstadt, Neustadt, and Spires, and had seen the Prussian army flee; Lacroix, a lawyer turned into a general, and made a Chevalier of Saint-Louis six days before the tenth of August. Fréron-Thersite, the son of Fréron-Zoïle. Ruhl, the inexorable searcher of the iron cupboard, predestined to a great republican suicide, he was to kill himself the day the Republic died; Fouché, with the soul of a demon and the face of a corpse; Camboulas, the friend of Father Duchêne, who said to Guillotin: "Thou belongest to the Club of the Feuillants, but thy daughter belongs to the Club of the Jacobin;" Jagot, who to such as complained to him of the nudity of the prisoners, replied by this savage saying: "A prison is a dress of stone;" Javogues, the terrible desecrator of the tombs of Saint-Denis; Osselin, a proscriber, who hid one of the proscribed, Madame Charry, in his house; Bentabolle, who, when he was in the chair, made signs to the tribunes to applaud or hoot; the journalist Robert, the husband of Mademoiselle Kéralio, who wrote: "Neither Robespierre nor Marat come to my house; Robespierre may come when he wishes, Marat, never." Garan-Coulon, who, when Spain interfered in the trial of Louis XVI., haughtily demanded that the Assembly should not deign to read the letter of a king in behalf of a king; Grégoire, a bishop, at first worthy of the Primitive Church, but who afterward, under the Empire, effaced Grégoire the Republican beneath the Count Grégoire; Amar, who said: "The whole earth condemns Louis XVI. To whom, then, appeal for judgment? To the planets?" Rouyer, who, on the twenty-first of January, opposed the firing of the cannon of the Pont-Neuf, saying: "A king's head ought to make no more noise in falling than the head of another man." Chénier, the brother of André; Vadier, one of those who laid a pistol on the tribune; Tanis, who said to Momoro: "I wish Marat and Robespierre to embrace at my table." —"Where dost thou live?"—"At Charenton."—"Any where else would have astonished me," replied Momoro; Legendre, who was the butcher of the French Revolution, as Pride had been of the English revolution; "Come, that I may knock you down," cried he to Lanjuinais. And Lanjuinais replied: "First have it decreed that I am a bullock." Collot d'Herbois, that mournful comedian who had the face of an antique mask, with two mouths which said Yes and No, approving with one while he blamed with the other; branding Carrier at Nantes and defying Châlier at Lyons; sending Robespierre to the scaffold and Marat to the Pantheon; Génissieux, who demanded the penalty of death against whomsoever should have upon him a medal of "Louis XVI. martyrized"; Léonard Bourdon, the schoolmaster, who had offered his house to the old man of Mont-Jura; Topsent, sailor, Goupilleau, lawyer, Laurent Lecointre, merchant, Duhem, physician, Sergent, sculptor, David, painter; Joseph Egalité, prince. Still others: Lecointe-Puiraveau, who asked that a decree should be passed declaring Marat mad. Robert Lindet, the disquieting creator of that devil-fish whose head was the Committee of General Surety, and which covered France with its twenty-one thousand arms called revolutionary committees; Lebœuf, upon whom Girey-Dupré, in his Christmas of False Patriots, had made this epigram:

"Lebœuf vit Legendre et beugla."

Thomas Paine, the clement American; Anacharsis Cloots, German, baron, millionaire, atheist, Hébertist, candid; the upright Lebas, the friend of the Duplays. Rovère, one of those strange men who are wicked for wickedness' sake; for the art, from love of the art, exists more frequently than people believe; Charlier, who wished that "you" should be employed in addressing aristocrats; Tallien, elegiac and ferocious, who will bring about the Ninth Thermidor from love; Cambacérès, a lawyer, who will later be a prince; Carrier, an attorney, who will become a tiger; Laplanche, who will one day cry: "I demand priority for the alarm-gun"; Thuriot, who desired the vote of the Revolutionary Tribunal to be given aloud; Bourdon de l'Oise, who challenged Chambon to a duel, denounced Payne, and was himself denounced by Hébert; Fayau, who proposed "the sending of an army of incendiaries" into the Vendée; Tavaux, who, on the thirteenth of April, was almost a mediator between the Gironde and the Mountain; Vernier, who proposed that the chiefs of the Gironde and the Mountain should be sent to serve as common soldiers; Rewbell, who shut himself up in Mayence; Bourbotte, who had his horse killed under him at the taking of Saumur; Guimberteau, who commanded the army of the Côtes de Cherbourg; Jard-Panvilliers, who commanded the army of the Côtes de Rochelle; Lecarpentier, who led the squadron of Cancale; Roberjot, for whom the ambush of Rastadt was waiting; Prieur de la Marne, who bore in camp his old rank of major; Levasseur de la Sarthe, who, by a word, decided Serrent, commandant of the battalion of Saint-Amand, to kill himself; Reverchon, Maure, Bernard de Saintes, Charles Richard, Lequinio and at the summit of this group a Mirabeau, who was called Danton.

Outside the two camps, and keeping both in awe, rose a man, Robespierre.

V.

Below crouched Dismay, which may be noble, and Fear, which is base. Beneath passions, beneath heroisms, beneath devotion, beneath rage, was the gloomy cohort of the Anonymous. The shoals of the Assembly were called The Plain. There was there everything which floats; the men who doubt, who hesitate, who recoil, who adjourn, who spy, each one fearing somebody. The Mountain was select; the Gironde was select; the Plain was a crowd. The Plain was summed up and condensed in Sieyès.

Sieyès, a thinker who had grown chimerical. He had stopped at the Tiers-État, and had not been able to mount up to the people. Certain minds are made to rest half-way. Sieyès called Robespierre a tiger, and was called a mole by Robespierre. This metaphysician had stranded, not on wisdom but prudence. He was the courtier, not the servitor, of the Revolution. He seized a shovel and went with the people to work in the Champ de Mars, harnessed to the same cart as Alexandre de Beauharnais. He counseled energy, but never showed it. He said to the Girondists: "Put the cannon on your side." There were thinkers who were wrestlers; those were, like Condorcet, with Vergniaud; or, like Camille Desmoulins, with Danton. There were thinkers whose aim was to preserve their lives; such were with Sieyès. The best working vats have their lees. Even underneath the Plain there was the Marsh. A hideous stagnation which exposed to view the transparencies of egotism. There shivered the fearful in dumb expectation. Nothing could be more abject. A conglomeration of shames feeling no shame; hidden rage; revolt under servitude. They were afraid in a cynical fashion; they had all the desperation of cowardice; they preferred the Gironde and chose the Mountain; the final catastrophe depended upon them; they poured toward the successful side; they delivered Louis XVI. to Vergniaud, Vergniaud to Danton, Danton to Robespierre, Robespierre to Tallien. They put Marat living in the pillory and deified Marat dead. They upheld everything until the day when they overturned everything. They had the instinct to give the decisive push to whatever tottered. In their eyes, since they had undertaken to serve on condition that the basis was solid, to waver was to betray them. They were number; they were force; they were fear. From thence came the audacity of turpitude.

Thence came the thirty-first of May, the Eleventh Germinal, the Ninth Thermidor; tragedies knotted by giants and untied by dwarfs.

VI.

Among these men full of passions were mingled men filled with dreams. Utopia was there under all its forms, under its warlike form which admitted the scaffold, and under its innocent form which would abolish capital punishment; a spectre as it faced thrones; an angel as it faced the people. Side by side with the spirits that fought, were the spirits that brooded. Some had war in their heads, others had peace; one brain, Carnot, brought forth fourteen armies; another intellect, Jean Debry, meditated a universal democratic federation. Amid this furious eloquence, among these shrieking and growling voices, there were fruitful silences. Lakanal remained voiceless, and combined in his thoughts the system of national public education; Lanthenas held his peace, and created the primary schools; Revellière-Lepeaux kept still, and dreamed of the elevation of Philosophy to the dignity of Religion. Others occupied themselves with questions of detail, smaller and more practical. Guyton-Morveaux studied means for rendering the hospitals healthy;

Maire, the abolition of existing servitudes; Jean-Bon-Saint-André, the suppression of imprisonment for debt and constraint of the person; Romme, the proposition of Chappe; Duboë, the arrangement of the archives; Coren-Fustier, the creation of the Cabinet of Anatomy and the Museum of Natural History; Guyomard, river navigation and the damming of the Escaut. Art had its fanatics and even its monomaniacs. On the twenty-first of January, while the head of monarchy was falling on the Place de la Revolution, Bézard the representative of the Oise, went to see a picture of Rubens, which had been found in a garret in the Rue Saint-Lazare. Artists, orators, prophets, giant-men like Danton, child-men like Cloots, gladiators and philosophers, all had the same goal, Progress. Nothing disconcerted them. The grandeur of the Convention was the searching how much reality there is in what men call the impossible. At one extreme, Robespierre had his eye fixed on Right; at the other, Condorcet had his fixed on Duty.

Condorcet was a man of revery and enlightenment. Robespierre was a man of execution; and sometimes, in the final crises of worn-out orders, execution means extermination. Revolutions have two currents, an ebb and a flow; and on these currents float all seasons, from that of ice to that of flowers. Each zone of these currents produces men adapted to its climate, from those who live in the sun to those who dwell among the thunderbolts.

VII.

People showed each other the recess of the left-hand passage, where Robespierre had uttered low in the ear of Garat, the friend of Clavière, these terrible words: "Clavière has conspired wherever he has respired." In this same recess, convenient for words needed to be spoken aside and for low-voiced angers, Fabre d'Églantine had quarreled with Romme, and reproached him for having disfigured his calendar by changing Fervidor into Thermidor. So, too, was shown the angle where, elbow to elbow, sat the seven representatives of the Haute-Garonne, who, first called to pronounce their verdict upon Louis XVI., thus responded, one after the other: Mailhe: "Death." — Delmas: "Death." — Projean: "Death." — Calès: "Death." — Ayral: "Death." — Julien: "Death." — Desascy: "Death." Eternal reverberation, which fills all history, and which, since human justice has existed, has always given an echo of the sepulchre to the wall of the tribunal. People pointed out with their fingers, among that group of stormy faces, all the men from whose mouths had come the uproar of tragic notes; Paganel, who said: "Death. A king is made useful only by his death;" Millaud, who said: "To-day, if death did not exist, it would be necessary to invent it;" old Raffron du Trouillet, who said: "Speedy death!" Goupilleau, who cried: "The scaffold at once. Delay aggravates dying." Sieyès, who said, with funereal brevity: "Death!" Thuriot, who had rejected the appeal to the people proposed by Buzot: "What! the primary assemblies! what! forty-four thousand tribunals! A case without limit. The head of Louis XVI. would have time to whiten before it fell." Augustin-Bon Robespierre, who, after his brother, cried: "I know nothing of the humanity which slaughters the people and pardons despots. Death! To demand a reprieve is to substitute an appeal to tyrants for the appeal to the people." Foussedoire, the substitute of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, who said: "I have a horror of the shedding of human blood, but the blood of a king is not the blood of a man. Death!" Jean-Bon-Saint-André, who said: "No free people without a dead tyrant." Lavicomterie, who proclaimed this formula: "So long as the tyrant breathes, Liberty is suffocated. Death!" Châteauneuf-Randon, who uttered this cry: "Death to the last Louis!" Guyardin, who had said: "Let the Barrière

Renversée (the overturned barrier) be executed!" The Barrière-Renversée was the barrier of The Throne; Tellier, who said: "Let there be cast, to aim against the enemy, a cannon of the calibre of Louis XVI.'s head." And the indulgents: Gentil, who said: "I vote for confinement. To make a Charles I. is to make a Cromwell;" Bancal, who said: "Exile. I want to see the first king of the earth condemned to a trade in order to earn his livelihood." Albouys, who said: "Banishment. Let this living ghost go wander among the thrones." Zangiacomi, who said: "Imprisonment. Let us keep Capet alive as a scarecrow; Chaillon, who said: "Let him live. I do not wish to make a dead man of one—whom Rome will make a saint." While these sentences fell from those severe lips and dispersed themselves, one after another, into history, women in low-necked dresses and decorated with gems sat in the tribunes, list in hand, counting the voices and pricking each vote with a pin.

Where tragedy has entered, horror and pity remain.

To see the Convention, no matter at what period of its reign, was to see anew the trial of the last Capet; the legend of the twenty-first of January seemed mingled with all its acts; the formidable Assembly was full of those fatal breaths which blew upon the old torch of monarchy, that had burned for eighteen centuries, and extinguished it; the decisive trials of all kings in that judgment pronounced upon one king was like the starting point in the great war made against the Past; whatever might be the sitting of the Convention at which one was present, one saw the shadow of Louis XVI.'s scaffold cast across it; the spectators recounted to one another the resignation of Kersaint, the resignation of Roland, Duchâtel, the deputy of the Deux-Sèvres, who, being ill, had himself carried to the Convention on his bed, and, dying, voted the king's life, which caused Marat to laugh; and they sought with their eyes the representative, whom history has forgotten, who, after that session of thirty-seven hours, fell back on his bench overcome by fatigue and sleep, and when roused by the usher as his turn to vote arrived, half opened his eyes, said "Death," and fell asleep again.

At the moment Louis XVI. was condemned to death, Robespierre had still eighteen months to live, Danton, fifteen months; Vergniaud, nine months; Marat, five months and three weeks; Lepelletier-Saint-Fargeau, one day. Quick and terrible blast from human mouths!

VIII.

The people had a window opening on the Convention, the public tribunes, and, when the window was not sufficient, they opened the door, and the street entered the Assembly. These invasions of the crowd into that senate make one of the most astounding visions of history. Ordinarily those irruptions were amicable. The market-place fraternized with the curule chair. But it was a formidable cordiality, that of a people who, one day, in three hours, took the cannon of the Invalides and forty thousand muskets. At each instant a troop interrupted the deliberations; deputations presented at the bar petitions, homages, offerings. The pike of honor of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine entered, borne by women. Certain English offered twenty thousand pairs of shoes for the naked feet of our soldiers. "The citizen Arnoux," announced the Moniteur, "Curé of Aubignan, Commandant of the Battalion of Drôme, asks to march to the frontiers, and desires that his parish may be reserved for him." Delegates from the Sections arrived, bringing on hand-barrows dishes, patens, chalices, monstrances, heaps of gold, silver, and enamel, presented to the country by this multitude in rags, who demanded as a recompense the permission to dance the Carmagnole before the Convention. Chenard, Narbonne, and Vallière came to sing couplets in honor of the Mountain. The Section of Mont-Blanc brought the bust of Lepelletier, and a woman placed a red cap on the head of the President, who embraced her, the "citizenesses of the Section du Mail" flung flowers "to the legislators." "The pupils of the country" came, headed by music, to thank the Convention for having prepared the prosperity of the century. The women of the Section of the Gardes-Françaises offered roses; the women of the Section of the Champs-Elysées gave a crown of oak-leaves; the women of the Section of the Temple came to the bar to swear "to unite themselves only with true Republicans." The Section of Molière presented a medal of Franklin, which was suspended by decree to the crown of the statue of Liberty. The Foundlings, styled the Children of the Republic, filed through, habited in the national uniform. The young girls of the Section of Ninety-two arrived in long white robes, and the Moniteur of the following morning contained this line: "The President received a bouquet from the innocent hands of a young beauty." The orators saluted the crowds; sometimes they flattered them; they said to the multitude: "Thou art infallible, thou art irreproachable, thou art sublime." The people has an infantile side; it likes those sugar-plums. Sometimes Riot traversed the Assembly: entered furious and withdrew appeased, like the Rhone which traverses Lake Léman, and is mud when it enters and pure and azure when it pours out.

Sometimes the crowd was less pacific, and Henriot was obliged to come with his "bullet-heaters" to the entrance of the Tuileries.

IX.

At the same time that it threw off revolution, this Assembly produced civilization. Furnace, but forge too. In this caldron, where terror bubbled, progress fermented. Out of this chaos of shadow, and this tumultuous flight of clouds, spread immense rays of light parallel to the eternal laws. Rays that have remained on the horizon, visible forever in the heaven of the peoples, and which are, one, Justice, another, Tolerance, another, Goodness, another, Right, another, Truth, another, Love. The Convention promulgated this grand axiom: "The liberty of each citizen ends where the liberty of another citizen commences;" which comprises in two lines all human social law. It declared indigence sacred, it declared infirmity sacred in the blind and the deaf and dumb, who became wards of the state; maternity sacred in the girl-mother, whom it consoled and lifted up, infancy sacred in the orphan, whom it caused to be adopted by the country; innocence sacred in the accused who was acquitted, whom it indemnified. It branded the slave-trade; it abolished slavery. It proclaimed civic joint responsibility. It decreed gratuitous instruction. It organized national education by the normal school of Paris, central schools in the chief towns, and primary schools in the communes. It created the academies of music and the museums. It decreed the unity of the code, the unity of weights and measures, and the unity of calculation by the decimal system. It established the finances of France, and caused public credit to succeed to the long monarchical bankruptcy. It put the telegraph in operation; to old age it gave endowed almshouses; to sickness, purified hospitals; to instruction, the Polytechnic School; to science, the Bureau of Longitudes; to human intellect, the Institute. At the same time that it was national it was cosmopolitan. Of the eleven thousand two hundred and ten degrees which emanated from the Convention, one-third had a political aim, two-thirds a human aim. It declared universal morality the basis of society and universal conscience the basis of law. And all that, servitude abolished, fraternity proclaimed, humanity protected, human conscience rectified, the law of work transformed into right and from onerous made honorable, national riches consolidated, childhood instructed and raised up, letters and sciences propagated, light illuminating all heights, aid to all sufferings, promulgation of all principles, the Convention accomplished, having in its bowels that hydra, the Vendée, and upon its shoulders that heap of tigers, the kings.

X.

Stupendous concourse! All types, human, inhuman, superhuman, were there. Epic gathering of antagonisms. Guillotin avoiding David, Bazire insulting Chabot, Gaudet mocking Saint-Just, Vergniaud disdaining Danton, Louvet attacking Robespierre, Buzot denouncing Égalité, Chambon branding Pache, all execrating Marat. And how many names remain still to be registered! Armonville, styled Bonnet-Rouge, because he always attended the sittings in a Phrygian cap, a friend of Robespierre, and wishing, "after Louis XVI., to guillotine Robespierre" in order to restore an equilibrium; Massieu, colleague and counterpart of that good Lamourette, a bishop destined to leave his name to a kiss; Lehardy du Morbihan, stigmatizing the priests of Brittany; Barère, the man of majorities, who presided when Louis XVI. appeared at the bar, and who was to Paméla what Louvet was to Lodoïska; the orator Daunou, who said: "Let us gain time;" Dubois-Crancé, close to whose ear leaned Marat; the Marquis de Châteauneuf, Laclos, Hérault de Séchelles, who recoiled before Henriot, crying: "Gunners, to your pieces!" Julien, who compared the Mountain to Thermopylæ; Gamon, who desired a public tribune reserved solely for women; Laloy, who adjudged the honors of the Assembly to Bishop Gobel coming to the Convention to lay down his mitre and put on the red cap; Lecomte, who exclaimed: "So the honors are for whosoever will unfrock himself!" Féraud, whose head Boissy-d'Anglas, saluted, leaving to history this question:—"Did Boissy-d'Anglas salute the head, that is to say, the victim, or the pike, that is to say, the assassins?" The two brothers Duprat, one a Montagnist, the other a Girondist, who hated each other like the two brothers Chénier.

At this tribune were uttered those mysterious words which sometimes possess, unknown to those who pronounce them, the prophetic accent of revolutions, and in whose wake material facts appear suddenly to assume an inexplicable discontent and passion, as if they had taken umbrage at the things just heard; events seem angered by words; catastrophes follow, furious and as if exasperated by the speech of men. Thus a voice upon a mountain suffices to set the avalanche in motion. A word too much may be followed by a landslip. If no one had spoken, the catastrophe would not have happened. You might say sometimes that events are irascible.

It was thus, by the chance of an orator's ill-comprehended word, that Madame Elizabeth's head fell.

At the Convention intemperance of language was a right.

Threats flew about and crossed one another like sparks in a conflagration. PÉTION: "Robespierre, come to the point." ROBESPIERRE: "The point is yourself, Pétion. I shall come to it, and you will see it." A VOICE: "Death to Marat!" MARAT: "The day Marat dies there will be no more Paris, and the day that Paris expires there will be no longer a Republic." Billaud-Varennes rises, and says: "We wish . . ." Barère interrupts him: "Thou speakest like a king." Another day, PHILIPPEAUX says: "A member has drawn his sword upon me." AUDOUIN: "President, call the assassin to order." THE PRESIDENT: "Wait." PANIS: "President, I call you to order—I—" There was rude laughter moreover. LECOINTRE: "The Curé of Chant-de-Bout complains of Fauchet, his bishop, who forbids his marrying." A VOICE: "I do not see why Fauchet, who has mistresses, should wish to hinder others from having wives." A SECOND VOICE: "Priest, take a wife!" The tribunes joined in the conversation. They said "thee" and "thou" to the members. One day the representative Raumps mounted to the tribune. He had one hip very much larger than the other. A spectator cried out: "Turn that toward the Right, since thou hast a cheek à la David." Such were the liberties the people took with the Convention. On one occasion, however, during the tumult of the eleventh of April, 1793, the President commanded a disorderly person in the tribunes to be arrested.

One day when the session had for a spectator the old Buonarotti, Robespierre takes the floor and speaks for two hours, staring at Danton, sometimes straight in the face, which was serious, sometimes obliquely, which was worse. He thunders on to the end, however. He closes with an indignant outburst full of menacing words:—"The conspirators are known, the corrupters and the corrupted are known, the traitors are known; they are in this Assembly. They hear us; we see them, and we do not move our eyes from them. Let them look above their heads, and they will see the sword of the law. Let them look into their conscience, and they will see their own infamy. Let them beware." And when Robespierre has finished, Danton, with his face raised toward the ceiling, his eyes half closed, one arm hanging loosely down, throws himself back in his seat, and is heard to hum:

"Cadet Roussel fait des discours,
Qui ne sont pas longs quand ils sont courts."
("Cadet Roussel doth make his speech
Which is quite short when it no length doth reach.")

Imprecations followed one another. Conspirator!—Assassin!—Scoundrel!—Factionist!—Moderate!—They denounced each other to the bust of Brutus that stood there. Apostrophes, insults, challenges. Furious glances from one side to the other. Fists shaken, pistols allowed to be seen, daggers half drawn. Terrible blazing forth in the tribune. Some talked as if they were driven back against the guillotine. Heads wavered, frightened and awed. Montagnists, Girondists, Feuillantists, Moderates, Terrorists, Jacobins, Cordeliers; eighteen regicide priests.

All these men! a mass of vapors driven wildly in every direction.

XI.

Spirits which were the prey of the wind.

But this was a miracle-working wind.

To be a member of the Convention was to be a wave of the ocean. This was true even of the greatest there. The force of impulsion came from on high. There was a will in the Convention which was that of all and yet not that of any one person. This will was an idea, an idea indomitable and immeasurable, which swept from the summit of heaven into the darkness below. We call this Revolution. When that idea passed, it beat down one and raised up another; it scattered this man into foam and dashed that one upon the reefs. This idea knew whither it was going, and drove the whirlpool before it. To ascribe the Revolution to men is to ascribe the tide to the waves.

The Revolution is a work of the Unknown. Call it good or bad, according as you lean toward the future or toward the past, but ascribe it to the power which caused it. It seems the joint work of grand events and grand individualities mingled, but it is in reality the result of events. Events dispense, men suffer.

Events dictate, men sign. The Fourteenth of July is signed Camille Desmoulins, the Tenth of August is signed Danton, the Second of September is signed Marat, the Twenty-first of September is signed Grégoire, the Twenty-first of January is signed Robespierre; but Desmoulins, Danton, Marat, Grégoire, and Robespierre are mere scribes. The great and mysterious writer of these grand pages has a name, God, and a mask, Destiny. Robespierre believed in God. Yea, verily!

The Revolution is a form of the eternal phenomenon which presses upon us from every corner and which we call Necessity.

Before this mysterious complication of benefits and sufferings arises the Wherefore? of history.

Because. This answer of him who knows nothing is also the answer of him who knows all.

In the presence of these climacteric catastrophes which devastate and revivify civilization, one hesitates to judge their details. To blame or to praise men on account of the result is almost like praising or blaming figures on account of the total. That which ought to happen happens, the wind which ought to blow blows. The eternal serenity does not suffer from these north winds. Above revolutions lie truth and justice, as the starry sky lies above and beyond the tempests.

XII.

Such was this immeasurable Convention ; a camp cut off from the human race, attacked by all the powers of darkness at once, the night-fires of the besieged army of ideas ; a vast bivouac of minds upon the edge of a precipice. There is nothing in history comparable to this group, at one time senate and populace, conclave and street-crossing, Areopagus and public square, tribunal and accused.

The Convention always bent to the wind ; but that wind came from the mouth of the people and was the breath of God.

And to-day, after eighty-four years have passed, always when the Convention presents itself to the thoughts of any man, whosoever he may be, historian or philosopher, that man pauses and meditates. It would be impossible not to remain thoughtfully attentive before this grand procession of shadows.

II.

MARAT IN THE GREEN-ROOM

Marat, in accordance with his announcement to Simonne Évrard, went to the Convention the morning after that interview in the Rue du Paon.

There was in the Convention a marquis who was a Maratist, Louis de Montaut, the same who afterward presented to the Convention a decimal clock surmounted by the bust of Marat.

At the moment Marat entered, Chabot had approached De Montaut.

"Ci-devant . . . ," said he.

Montaut raised his eyes.

"Why do you call me ci-devant?"

"Because you are so."

"I?"

"For you were a marquis."

"Never."

"Bah!"

"My father was a soldier; my grandfather was a weaver."

"What song is that you are singing, Montaut?"

"My name is not Montaut."

"What is your name then?"

"My name is Maribon."

"As you will," said Chabot, "it is all the same to me."

And he added between his teeth:

"No marquis on any terms."

Marat stood in the corridor to the left and watched Montaut and Chabot.

Whenever Marat entered, there was a murmur; but never near to him. About him people kept silence. Marat paid no attention to the fact. He disdained "the croaking of the marsh."

In the obscurity of the lower row of seats, Conpé de l'Oise, Prunelle, Villars, a bishop who was afterward a member of the French Academy, Boutroue, Petit, Plaichard, Bonet, Thibaudeau, and Valdruche pointed him out to one another.

"Look! Marat!"

"Then he is not ill?"

"Yes, for he is here in a dressing-gown."

"In a dressing-gown?"

"Zounds, yes!"

"He takes liberties enough!"

"He dares to come like that into the Convention!"

"As he came one day crowned with laurels, he may certainly come in a dressing-gown!"

"A face of brass and teeth of verdigris."

"His dressing-gown looks new."

"What is it made of?"

"Ribbed velvet."

"Striped."

"Look at the lapels."

"They are fur."

"Tiger skin."

"No; ermine."

"Imitation."

"He has stockings on!"

"That is odd."

"And shoes with buckles!"

"Of silver!"

"Camboulas's sabots will not pardon that."

People in other seats affected not to see Marat. They talked of indifferent matters. Santhonax said to Dussaulx:

"Do you know, Dussaulx?"

"Who?"

"The ci-devant Comte de Brienne?"

"Who was in La Force with the ci-devant Duc de Villeroy?"

"Yes."

"I knew them both. Well?"

"They were so horribly frightened that they saluted the red caps of all the turnkeys, and one day they refused to play a game of piquet because somebody offered them cards that had kings and queens among them."

"Well?"

"They were guillotined yesterday."

"Both of them?"

"Both."

"Indeed; how had they behaved in prison?"

"As cowards."

"And how did they appear on the scaffold?"

"As brave men."

And Dussaulx exclaimed:

"It is easier to die than to live!"

Barère was reading a report; it was in regard to the Vendée. Nine hundred men of Morbihan had started with cannon to relieve Nantes. Redon was threatened by the peasants. Paimbœuf had been attacked. A fleet was cruising about Maindrin to prevent invasions. From Ingrande, as far as Maure, the entire left bank of the Loire was bristling with Royalist batteries. Three thousand peasants were masters of Pornic. They cried: "Long live the English!" A letter from Santerre to the Convention, which Barère was reading, ended with these words: "Seven thousand peasants attacked Vannes. We repulsed them, and they have left in our hands four cannon . . ."

"And how many prisoners?" interrupted a voice.

Barère continued . . . Postscript of the letter: "We have no prisoners, because we no longer make any." (Moniteur, vol. xix. p. 81.)

Marat, standing motionless, did not listen; he appeared absorbed by a stern preoccupation.

He held in his hand and crumpled between his fingers a paper, which, had any one unfolded it, he might have read these lines in Momoro's writing and probably a reply to some question he had been asked by Marat:

"No opposition can be offered to the full powers of delegated commissioners, above all, to the Committee of Public Safety. Genissieux in vain said, in the sitting of the sixth of May, 'Each Commissioner is more than a king;' it had no effect. Life and death are in their hands. Massade to Angers, Trullard to Saint-Amand, Nyon near General Marcé, Parrein to the army of Sables, Millières to the army of Niort, are all-powerful. The Club of the Jacobins has gone so far as to name Parrein brigadier-general. The circumstances excuse everything. A delegate from the Committee of Public Safety holds in check a commander-in-chief."

Marat ceased crumpling the paper, put it in his pocket, and walked slowly toward Montaut and Chabot, who continued to talk, and had not seen him enter.

Chabot was saying:

"Maribon, or Montaut, listen to this: I have just come from the Committee of Public Safety."

"And what is being done there?"

"They are setting a priest to watch a noble."

"Ah!"

"A noble like yourself . . ."

"I am not a noble," interrupted Montaut.

"To be watched by a priest . . ."

"Like you."

"I am not a priest," said Chabot.

They both began to laugh.

"Make your story explicit," continued Montaut.

"Here it is, then. A priest named Cimourdain is delegated with full powers to a vicomte named Gauvain; this vicomte commands the exploring column of the army of the Côtes. The question will be to keep the nobleman from trickery and the priest from treason."

"It is very simple," replied Montaut. "It is only necessary to bring death into the matter."

"I come for that," said Marat.

They looked up.

"Good-morning, Marat," said Chabot. "You rarely attend our meetings."

"My doctor has ordered me baths," answered Marat.

"One should beware of baths," returned Chabot; "Seneca died in a bath."

Marat smiled.

"Chabot, there is no Nero here."

"There is you," said a rude voice.

It was Danton who passed and ascended to his seat.

Marat did not turn round.

He thrust his head in between Montaut and Chabot.

"Listen. I come about a serious matter. One of us three must propose to-day the draft of a decree to the Convention."

"Not I," said Montaut; "I am never listened to, I am a marquis."

"And I," said Chabot, "I am not listened to, I am a Capuchin."

"And I," said Marat, "I am not listened to, I am Marat."

There was silence.

It was not easy to question Marat when he was preoccupied. Still Montaut hazarded a question.

"Marat, what is the decree that you wish passed?"

"A decree to punish with death any military chief who allows a rebel prisoner to escape."

Chabot interrupted.

"The decree exists. It was passed in April."

"Then, it is just the same as if it did not exist," said Marat. "Everywhere, all through Vendée, anybody who chooses helps prisoners to escape and gives them an asylum with impunity."

"Marat, the fact is, the decree has fallen into disuse."

"Chabot, it must be put into force anew."

"Without doubt."

"And to do that the Convention must be addressed."

"Marat, the Convention is not necessary; the Committee of Public Safety will suffice."

"The end will be gained," added Montaut, "if the Committee of Public Safety cause the decree to be placarded in all the communes of the Vendée, and make two or three good examples."

"Of men in high position," continued Chabot. "Of generals."

Marat grumbled: "Yes, that will answer."

"Marat," said Chabot, "go yourself and say that to the Committee of Public Safety."

Marat looked straight into his eyes, which was not pleasant, even for Chabot.

"The Committee of Public Safety," said he, "sits in Robespierre's house. I do not go to Robespierre's house."

"I will go myself," said Montaut.

"Good," said Marat.

The next morning an order from the Committee of Public Safety was sent in all directions among the towns and villages of Vendée, enjoining the publication and strict execution of the decree of death against any person conniving at the escape of brigands and captive insurgents. This decree proved only a first step. The Convention was to go further than that. A few months later, the Eleventh Brumaire, Year II., (November, 1793,) when Laval opened its gates to the Vendean fugitives, the Convention decreed that any city giving asylum to the rebels should be demolished and destroyed.

On their side, the princes of Europe, in the manifesto of the Duke of Brunswick, conceived by the emigrants and drawn up by the Marquis de Linnon, intendant of the Duke of Orleans, had declared that every Frenchman taken with arms in his hand should be shot, and that, if a hair of the king's head fell, Paris should be razed to the ground.

Cruelty against barbarity.

PART THREE

IN THE VENDÉE

BOOK ONE

THE WAR OF THE VENDÉE

I.

THE FORESTS

There were at that time seven ill-famed forests in Brittany. The Vendean war was a revolt of priests. This revolt had the forests as auxiliaries. The spirits of darkness aid one another.

The seven Black-Forests of Brittany were the forest of Fougères, which stopped the way between Dol and Avranches; the forest of Princé, which was eight leagues in circumference; the forest of Paimpol, full of ravines and brooks, almost inaccessible on the side toward Baignon, with an easy retreat to Concornet, which was a royalist town; the forest of Rennes, from whence could be heard the tocsin of the Republican parishes, always numerous in the neighborhood of the cities; it was in this forest that Puysage lost Focard; the forest of Machecoul, which had Charette for its wild beast; the forest of Garnache, which belonged to the La Trémoilles, the Gauvains, and the Rohans; and the forest of Brocéliande, which belonged to the fairies.

One gentleman of Brittany bore the title of Lord of the Seven-Forests. This was the Vicomte de Fontenay, prince of Brittany.

For the Breton prince existed, distinct from the French prince. The Rohans were Breton princes. Garnier de Saintes, in his report to the Convention of the Fifteenth Nivôse, Year II., thus distinguishes the Prince de Talmont: "This Capet of the brigands, sovereign of Maine and of Normandy."

The record of the Breton forests, from 1792 to 1800, would form a history of itself, mingling like a legend with the vast undertaking of the Vendée.

History has its truth, Legend has hers. Legendary truth is wholly different from historic. Legendary truth is invention that has reality for a result. Still history and legend have the same aim, that of depicting the external type of humanity.

The Vendée can only be completely understood by adding legend to history; history is needed to describe its entirety, legend the details.

We may say, too, that the Vendée was worth the cost. The Vendée was a prodigy.

This war of the Ignorant, so stupid and so splendid, so abject yet magnificent, was the desolation and the pride of France. The Vendée is a wound which is at the same time a glory.

At certain crises human society has its enigmas, enigmas which resolve themselves into light for sages, but which the ignorant in their darkness translate into violence and barbarism. The philosopher is slow to accuse. He takes into consideration the agitation caused by these problems. Problems which cannot pass without casting about them shadows dark as those of the storm-cloud.

If one wish to comprehend the Vendée, one must picture to one's self this antagonism, on one side the French Revolution, on the other the Breton peasant. In face of these unparalleled events, an immense promise of all benefits at once, a fit of rage for civilization, an excess of maddened progress, an improvement that exceeded measure and comprehension, must be placed this grave, strange, savage man, with an eagle glance and flowing hair, living on milk and chestnuts, his ideas bounded by his thatched roof, his hedge, and his ditch, able to distinguish the sound of each village bell in the neighborhood, using water only to drink, wearing a leather jacket covered with silken arabesques, uncultivated but embroidered, tattooing his garments as his ancestors the Celts tattooed their faces, looking up to a master in his executioner, speaking a dead language, which is like forcing one's thoughts to dwell in a tomb, driving his bullocks, sharpening his scythe, winnowing his black grain, kneading his buckwheat biscuit, venerating his plow first, his grandmother next, believing in the Blessed Virgin and the White Lady, devoted to the altar but also to the lofty mysterious stone standing in the midst of the moor, a laborer in the plain, a fisher on the coast, a poacher in the thicket, loving his kings, his lords, his priests, his very lice; pensive, immovable for often entire hours upon the great deserted shore, a melancholy listener to the sea.

Then ask yourself if it would have been possible for this blind man to welcome that light.

II.

THE MEN

The peasant had two supports on which he leaned: the field which nourished him, the wood which concealed him.

It is difficult to picture to one's self what those forests in Brittany really were; they were towns. Nothing could be more secret, more mute and more savage than those inextricable entanglements of thorns and branches; those vast thickets were the home of immobility and silence; no solitude could present an appearance more death-like and sepulchral; yet if it had been possible to fell those trees at one blow, as by a flash of lightning, a swarm of men would have stood revealed in those shades.

There were wells, round and narrow, hidden by coverings of stones and branches, the interior at first vertical, then horizontal, spreading out underground like funnels, and ending in dark chambers; Cambyses found such in Egypt and Westermann found the same in Brittany; there they were found in the desert, here in the forest; the caves of Egypt held dead men, the caves of Brittany were filled with the living. One of the wildest glades of the wood of Misdon, perforated by galleries and cells amid which came and went a mysterious society, was called "The Great City." Another glade, not less deserted above ground and not less inhabited beneath, was styled "La Place Royale."

This subterranean life had existed in Brittany from time immemorial. From the earliest days man had hidden there, flying from man. Hence those hiding-places, like the dens of reptiles, hollowed out below the roots of the trees. They dated from the era of the Druids, and some of those crypts were as ancient as the cromlechs. The larvæ of legend and the monsters of history had all passed across that shadowy land. Teutatès, Cæsar, Hoël, Nornenes, Geoffrey of England, Alain of the Iron Glove, Pierre Mauclerc, the French house of Blois, the English house of Montfort, kings and dukes, the nine barons of Brittany, the judges of the Great Days, the counts of Nantes, contesting with the counts of Rennes, highwaymen, banditti, Free Lances, René II., Vicomte de Rohan, the governors for the king, "the good Duke of Chaulnes," aiming at the peasants under the windows of Madame de Sévigné, in the fifteenth century the butcheries by the nobles, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the wars of religion, in the eighteenth century the thirty thousand dogs trained to hunt men; beneath these pitiless tramplings the inhabitants had made up their minds to disappear. Each in turn, the Troglodytes to escape the Celts, the Celts to escape the Romans, the Bretons to escape the Normans, the Huguenots to escape the Roman Catholics, the smugglers to escape the excise officers, had taken refuge first in the forests and then underground. The resource of hunted animals. It is to this that tyranny reduces nations. During two thousand years, despotism under all its forms, conquest, feudality, fanaticism, taxes, beset this wretched, distracted Brittany, a sort of inexorable battue, which ceased under one shape only to recommence under another. Men hid underground.

Terror, which is a species of rage, was already latent in human souls, and when the Republic burst forth the dens were ready in the woods. Brittany revolted, finding itself oppressed by this forced deliverance. A mistake natural to slaves.

III.

CONNIVANCE OF MEN AND FORESTS

The gloomy forests of Brittany took up anew their ancient rôle and were the servants and accomplices of this rebellion, as they had been of all others.

The subsoil of every forest was a sort of madrepore, pierced and traversed in all directions by a secret highway of mines, cells, and galleries. Each one of these blind cells could shelter five or six men. There are in existence certain strange lists which enable one to understand the powerful organization of that vast peasant rebellion. In Ille-et-Vilaine, in the forest of Pertre, the refuge of the Prince de Talmont, not a breath was heard, not a human trace to be found, yet there were six thousand men there under Focard; in Morbihan, in the forest of Meulac, not a soul was to be seen, yet it held eight thousand men. Still, these two forests, Pertre and Meulac, are not counted among the great forests of Brittany. If one trod there, it was terrible.

Those hypocritical copses, filled with fighters waiting in a sort of underground labyrinth, were like enormous black sponges, whence, under the pressure of that gigantic foot, the Revolution, civil war spurted out.

Invisible battalions lay there in wait. These unsuspected armies wound along beneath the Republican troops, burst suddenly forth from the earth and sank into it again, sprang up in numberless force and vanished at will, gifted with a strange ubiquity and power of disappearance, an avalanche at one moment, gone like a cloud of dust at the next, giants yet able to become pigmies at will, giants in battle, dwarfs in ability to conceal themselves. Jaguars with the habits of moles.

There were not only the forests, there were the woods. Just as below cities there are villages, below these forests there were woods and underwoods. The forests were united by the labyrinths, everywhere scattered, of the woods. The ancient castles which were fortresses, the hamlets which were camps, the farms which were inclosures for ambushes and snares, traversed by ditches and palisaded by trees, were the meshes of the net in which the Republican armies were caught.

This whole formed what was called the Bocage.

There was the wood of Misdon, which had a pond in its centre, and which was held by Jean

Chouan ; there was the wood of Gennes, which belonged to Taillefer ; there was the wood of La Huisserie, which belonged to Gouge-le-Bruant ; the wood of La Charnie, where lurked Courtillé-le-Bâtard, called the Apostle Saint Paul, chief of the camp of the Vache-Noire ; the wood of Burgault, which was held by that enigmatical Monsieur Jacques, reserved for a mysterious end in the vault of Juvardeil ; there was the wood of Charreau, where Pimousse and Petit-Prince, attacked by the garrison of Châteauneuf, rushed forward and seized the grenadiers in the Republican ranks about the waist and carried them back prisoners ; the wood of La Heureuserie, the witness of the rout of the military post of Longue-Faye ; the wood of Aulne, whence the road between Rennes and Laval could be overlooked ; the wood of La Gravelle, which a prince of La Trémoille had won at a game of bowls ; the wood of Lorges, in the Côtes-du-Nord, where Charles de Boishardy reigned after Bernard de Villeneuve ; the wood of Bagnard, near Fontenay, where Lescure offered battle to Chalbos, who, although one against five, accepted the challenge ; the wood of La Durondais, which in old days had been disputed by Alain le Redru and Hérispoux, son of Charles the Bold ; the wood of Croqueloup, upon the edge of that moor where Coquereau sheared the prisoners; the wood of La Croix-Bataille, which witnessed the Homeric insults of Jambe-d'Argent to Morière and of Morière to Jambe-d'Argent; the wood of La Saudraie, which we have seen being searched by a Paris regiment. There were also many others.

In several of these forests and woods there were not only subterranean villages grouped about the burrow of the chief; but also actual hamlets of low huts hidden under the trees, sometimes so numerous that the forest was filled with them. Frequently they were betrayed by the smoke. Two of these hamlets of the wood of Misdon have remained famous, Lorrière, near the pond, and, on the side toward Saint-Ouen-les-Toits, the group of cabins called the Rue-de-Bau.

The women lived in the huts, and the men in the cellars. In carrying on the war, they utilized the galleries of the fairies and the old Celtic mines. Food was carried to the buried men. Some were forgotten and died of hunger. These were awkward fellows who had not known how to open the mouth of their well. Usually the cover, made of moss and branches, was so artistically fashioned that, although impossible on the outside to distinguish from the surrounding turf, it was very easy to open and close on the inside.

These hiding-places were dug with care. The earth taken out of the well was flung into some neighboring pond. The sides and the bottom were carpeted with ferns and moss. These nooks were called "lodges." The men were as comfortable there as could be expected, considering that they lacked light, fire, bread, and air.

To unbury themselves and come up among the living without great precaution was a serious matter. They might find themselves between the legs of an army on the march. These were formidable woods; snares with a double trap. The Blues dared not enter, the Whites dared not come out.

IV.

THEIR LIFE UNDERGROUND

The men grew weary of their wild-beast lairs. Sometimes, at night, they came forth at any risk and went to dance upon the neighboring moor. Or else they prayed in order to kill time. "Every day," said Bourdoiseau, "Jean Chouan made us count our rosaries."

It was almost impossible, when the season came, to keep those of the Bas-Maine from going out for the Fête de la Gerbe. Some of them had ideas peculiar to themselves. "Denys," says Tranche-Montagne, "disguised himself as a woman, in order to go to the theatre at Laval; he then went back into his hole."

Suddenly they would rush forth in search of death, exchanging the dungeon for the sepulchre.

Sometimes they raised the cover of their trench, and listened to hear if there were fighting in the distance; they followed the combat with their ears. The firing of the Republicans was regular, the firing of the Royalists, scattered; this guided them. If the platoon-firing ceased suddenly, it was a sign that the Royalists were defeated; if the irregular firing continued, and retreated toward the horizon, it was a sign that they had the advantage. The Whites always pursued; the Blues never, because they had the country against them.

These underground belligerents were kept perfectly informed of what was going on. Nothing could be more rapid, nothing more mysterious, than their means of communication. They had cut all the bridges, broken up all the wagons, yet they found means to tell each other everything, to give each other timely warning. Relays of emissaries were established from forest to forest, from village to village, from farm to farm, from cottage to cottage, from bush to bush.

A stupid looking peasant passed by, he carried dispatches in his hollow stick.

An ancient constituent, Boétidoux, furnished them, to pass from one end of Brittany to the other, with Republican passports according to the new form, with blanks for the names, of which this traitor had bundles. It was impossible to discover these emissaries. Says Puysage: "The secrets confided to more than four hundred thousand individuals were religiously guarded."

It appeared that this quadrilateral, closed on the south by a line between Sables and Thouars, on the east by a line between Thouars and Saumur and the river of Thoué, on the north by the Loire, and on the west by the ocean, possessed everywhere the same nervous activity, and not a single point of this soil could stir without shaking the whole. In the twinkling of an eye Luçon had information in regard to Noirmoutier, and the camp of La Loué knew what the camp of Croix-Morineau was doing. It seemed as if the very birds of the air carried tidings. The Seventh Messidor, year III., Hoche wrote: "One might believe that they have telegraphs."

They were in clans, as in Scotland. Each parish had its captain. In that war my father fought, and I can speak advisedly thereof.

V.

THEIR LIFE IN TIME OF WAR

Many of them were armed only with pikes. Good fowling-pieces were abundant. No marksmen could be more expert than the poachers of the Bocage and the smugglers of the Loroux. They were strange combatants, terrible and fearless. The decree for the levy of three hundred thousand men had been the signal for the tocsin to sound in six hundred villages. The blaze of the conflagration burst forth in all quarters at the same time. Poitou and Anjou exploded on one day. Let us add that a premonitory rumbling had made itself heard on the moor of Kerbader on the eighth of July, 1792, a month before the tenth of August. Alain Redeler, to-day forgotten, was the precursor of La Rochejacquelein and Jean Chouan. The Royalists forced all able-bodied men to march, under pain of death. They requisitioned harnesses, carts, and provisions. Immediately Sapinaud had three thousand soldiers, Cathelineau ten thousand, Stofflet twenty thousand, and Charette was master of Noirmoutier. The Vicomte de Scépeaux roused the Haut-Anjou; the Chevalier de Dieuzie, l'Entre Vilaine-et-Loire; Tristan l'Hermit, the Bas-Maine; the barber Gaston, the city of Guéménée; and Abbé Bernier all the rest. It needed but little to rouse all those multitudes. In the altar of a sworn priest, a "priest swearer," as the people called him, was placed a great black cat, which sprang suddenly out during mass. "It is the devil!" cried the peasants, and a whole canton rose in revolt. A breath of fire issued from the confessionals. To attack the Blues and to leap the ravines, they had their poles fifteen feet in length, called la ferte, an arm available for combat and for flight. In the thickest of the frays, when the peasants were attacking the Republican squares, if they chanced to meet upon the battlefield a cross or a chapel, all fell upon their knees and said a prayer under the enemy's fire; the rosary counted, such as were still living sprang up again and rushed upon the foe. Alas, what giants! They loaded their guns as they ran; that was their peculiar talent. They were made to believe whatever their leaders chose. The priests showed them other priests whose necks had been reddened by means of a cord, and said to them: "These are the guillotined who have been brought back to life." They had their spasms of chivalry; they honored Fesque, a Republican standard-bearer, who allowed himself to be sabred without losing hold of his flag. The peasants had a vein of mockery; they called the Republican married priests "Des sans-calottes devenus sans-culottes" ("The unpetticoated become the un-breeched"). They began by being afraid of the cannon, then they dashed forward with their sticks and took them. They captured first a fine bronze cannon, which they baptized "The Missionary;" then another which dated from the Roman Catholic wars and upon which were engraved the arms of Richelieu and a figure of the Virgin; this they named "Marie-Jeanne." When they lost Fontenay they lost Marie-Jeanne, about which six hundred peasants fell without flinching; then they retook Fontenay in order to recover Marie-Jeanne: they brought it back beneath a fleur-de-lis embroidered banner and covered with flowers, and forced the women who passed to kiss it. But two cannons were a small store. Stofflet had taken Marie-Jeanne; Cathelineau, jealous of his success, started out of Pin-en-Mauge, assaulted Jallais, and captured a third; Forest attacked Saint-Florent and took a fourth. Two other captains, Choupees and Saint-Pol, did better; they imitated cannons by the trunks of trees, gunners by manikins, and with this artillery, about which they laughed heartily, made the Blues retreat to Mareuil. This was their great era. Later, when Chalbos routed La Marsonnière, the peasants left behind them on the dishonored field of battle thirty-two cannons bearing the arms of England. England at that time paid the French princes, and, as Nantiat wrote on the tenth of May, 1794, "sent funds to Monseigneur, because Pitt had been told that it was proper so to do." Mellinel, in a report of the thirty-first of March, said: "The cry of the rebels is, 'Long live the English!'" The peasants delayed themselves by pillage. These devotees were robbers. Savages have their vices. It is by these that civilization captures them later. Puysage says, vol. ii., page 187: "I have several times preserved the town of Phélan from pillage." And further on, page 434, he recounts how he was prevented from entering Montfort: "I made a circuit in order to prevent the plundering of the Jacobins' houses." They robbed Chollett; they sacked Chalons. After having failed at Granville, they pillaged Ville-Dieu. They styled the "Jacobin herd" those of the country people who had joined the Blues, and exterminated such with more ferocity than their other foes. They loved battle like soldiers, and massacre like brigands. To shoot the "clumsy fellows," that is, the bourgeois, pleased them; they called that "breaking Lent." At Fontenay, one of their priests, the Curé Barbotin, struck down an old man by a sabre stroke. At Saint-Germain-sur-Ille, one of their captains, a nobleman, shot the solicitor of the commune and took his watch. At Machecoul, they shot Republicans at the rate of thirty a day, for five weeks; every chain of thirty was called "a rosary." Back of the line was a trench; as they were shot they fell into the trench sometimes still living; they were buried all the same. We have seen a revival of such actions. Joubert, the president of the district, had his hands sawed off. They put sharp handcuffs, forged expressly, on the Blues whom they made prisoners. They massacred them in the public places, uttering fierce war-whoops. Charette, who signed: "Fraternity; the Chevalier Charette," and who wore for head-covering a handkerchief knotted about his brows after Marat's fashion, burned the city of Pornic, and the inhabitants in their houses. During that time Carrier was horrible. Terror replied to terror. The Breton insurgent had almost the appearance of a Greek rebel, with his short jacket, his gun slung over his shoulder, his leggings, and large breeches similar to the fustanelle. The boys resembled the Klephte. Henri de la Rochejacquelein, at the age of twenty-one, set out for this war armed with a stick and a pair of pistols. The Vendean army counted a hundred and fifty-four divisions. They undertook regular sieges; they held Bressuire invested for three days. One Good Friday ten thousand peasants cannonaded the town of the Sables with hot shot. They succeeded in a single day in destroying fourteen Republican cantons, from Montigné to Courbeveilles. On the high wall of Thouars this dialogue was heard between La Rochejacquelein and a peasant lad as they stood below: "Charles!" "Here I am." "Stand so that I can mount on your shoulders." "Jump up." "Your gun." "Take it."

And Rochejacquelein leaped into the town, and the towers which Duguesclin had besieged were taken without the aid of ladders. They preferred a cartridge to a gold louis. They wept when they lost sight of their village belfry. To run away seemed perfectly natural to them; at such times the leaders would cry: "Throw off your sabots, but keep hold of your guns!" When munitions were wanting, they counted their rosaries and rushed forth to seize the powder in the caissons of the Republican artillery; later, D'Elbée demanded powder from the English. At the approach of the enemy, if they had wounded men among them, they concealed them in the grain-fields or among the ferns, and, when the fight was ended, went back in search of them. They had no uniforms. Their garments were torn to bits. Peasants and nobles wrapped themselves in any rags they could find. Roger Mouliniers wore a turban and a pelisse taken from the wardrobe of the theatre of La Flèche; the Chevalier de Beauvilliers wore a barrister's gown, and set a woman's bonnet on his head over a woolen cap. All wore the white belt and a scarf; the different grades were distinguished by knots. Stofflet had a red knot; La Rochejacquelein had a black knot; Wimpfen, who was half a Girondist, and who for that matter never left Normandy, wore the leather jacket of the Carabots of Caen. They had women in their ranks, Madame de Lescure, who became Madame de la Rochejacquelein; Thérèse de Mollien, the mistress of La Rouarie, she who burned the list of the chiefs of the parishes; Madame de la Rochefoucauld, beautiful, young, who, sabre in hand, rallied the peasants to the foot of the great tower of the castle of Puy-Rousseau; and that Antoinette Adams, styled the Chevalier Adams, who was so brave that when captured she was shot standing, out of respect for her courage. This epic period was a cruel one. Men were mad. Madame de Lescure made her horse tread upon the Republicans stretched on the ground; they were dead, she averred; they were perhaps only wounded. Sometimes the men proved traitors, the women, never. Mademoiselle Fleury, of the Théâtre Français, went from La Rouarie to Marat, but it was for love. The captains were often as ignorant as the soldiers; M. de Sapinaud could not spell; he was at fault in regard to the orthography of the commonest word, he wrote: "Nous orious de notre caute." There was enmity among the leaders; the captains of the Marais cried: "Down with those of the upper country!" Their cavalry was not numerous and difficult to form. Puysage writes: "Many a man who would cheerfully give me his two sons grows lukewarm if I ask for one of his horses." Poles, pitchforks, reaping-hooks, old and new guns, poachers' knives, spits, cudgels bound and studded with iron, these were their arms; some of them carried crosses made of dead men's bones. They rushed to an attack with loud cries, springing up suddenly from every quarter, from the woods, the hills, the bushes, the hollows of the roads, killing, exterminating, destroying, then were gone. When they marched through a Republican town they cut down the liberty pole, set it on fire, and danced in circles about it as it burned. All their habits were nocturnal. The Vendean rule was : always appear unexpectedly. They would march fifteen leagues in silence, not so much as stirring a blade of grass as they went. When evening came, after the chiefs had settled what Republican posts should be surprised on the morrow, the men loaded their guns, mumbled their prayers, pulled off their sabots, and filed in long columns, through the woods, marching barefoot across the heath and moss, without a sound, without a word, without an audible breath. It was like the march of wild cats through the darkness.

VI.

THE SPIRIT OF THE COUNTRY PASSES INTO THE MAN

The Vendée in insurrection did not number less than five hundred thousand, counting men, women, and children. A half-million combatants is the sum total given by Tuffin de la Rouarie.

The Federalists helped them; the Vendée had the Gironde for an accomplice. La Lozère sent thirty thousand men into the Bocage. Eight departments coalesced, five in Brittany, three in Normandy. Evreux, which fraternized with Caen, was represented in the rebellion by Chaumont, its mayor, and Gardembas, a man of note. Buzot, Gorsas, and Barbaroux, at Caen; Brissot, at Moulins; Chassan, at Lyons; Rabaut-Saint-Étienne, at Nîmes; Meillan and Duchâtel, in Brittany; all these mouths blew the furnace.

There were two Vendean armies: the great, which carried on the war of the forests, the little, which waged the war of the thickets; it is that shade which separates Charette from Jean Chouan. The little Vendée was honest, the great was corrupt; the little was much better. Charette was made a marquis, lieutenant-general of the armies of the king, and received the great cross of Saint-Louis; Jean Chouan remained Jean Chouan. Charette borders on the bandit, Jean Chouan resembled a paladin.

As to those magnanimous chiefs, Bonchamps, Lescure, La Rochejacquelein, they deceived themselves. The great Catholic army was an insane attempt; disaster could not fail to follow it. Let any one imagine a tempest of peasants attacking Paris, a coalition of villages besieging the Pantheon, a pack of Christmas carols and orison barking around The Marseillaise, a troop of herdsmen flinging themselves upon a host governed by the light of intellect. Le Mans and Savenay chastised this madness. It was impossible for the Vendée to cross the Loire. She could do everything, except that leap. Civil war does not conquer. To pass the Rhine establishes a Cæsar and strengthens a Napoleon; to cross the Loire killed La Rochejacquelein.

The real strength of the Vendée was the Vendée at home; there she was more than invulnerable, she was unconquerable. The Vendean at home was a smuggler, a laborer, a soldier, a shepherd, a poacher, a sharpshooter, a goatherd, a bell-ringer, a peasant, a spy, an assassin, a sacristan, a wild beast of the wood.

La Rochejacquelein is only Achilles, Jean Chouan is Proteus.

The revolt of the Vendée failed. Other revolts have succeeded, that of Switzerland, for example. There is this difference between the mountain insurgent like the Swiss and the forest insurgent like the Vendean, that, almost always, the surroundings exert a baneful influence, one fights for an ideal, the other for a prejudice. One soars, the other crawls. One fights for humanity, the other for solitude; one desires liberty, the other wishes isolation; one defends the people, the other the parish. "The people! the people!" cried the heroes of Morat. One has to deal with precipices, the other with quagmires; one is the man of torrents and foaming streams, the other of stagnant pool, where pestilence lurks; one has his head in the blue sky, the other in the thicket; one is on a summit, the other in a shadow.

The education of the heights and of the lowlands is very different.

The mountain is a citadel, the forest is an ambuscade; one inspires courage, the other teaches trickery. Antiquity placed the gods on the heights and the satyrs in the woods. The satyr is the savage; half-man, half-brute.

The free countries have the Apennines, the Alps, the Pyrenees, an Olympus. Parnassus is a mountain. Mont Blanc was the colossal auxiliary of William Tell; below and above those immense struggles of souls against the night which fill the poems of India, we see the Himalayas. Greece, Spain, Italy, Switzerland, have as their symbol the mountain; Cimmeria, whether Germany or Brittany, has the wood. The forest is barbarous.

The configuration of the soil decides many of man's actions. The earth is more his accomplice than people believe. In the presence of certain savage landscapes one is tempted to exonerate man and accuse creation; one feels a certain hidden provocation on the part of nature; the desert is sometimes unhealthy for the conscience, especially for the conscience that is in partial darkness; conscience may be a giant, then she produces a Socrates, a Christ; she may be a dwarf, then she moulds an Atreus, a Judas. The narrow conscience quickly becomes reptile in its instincts; forests where twilight reigns, the bushes, the thorns, the marshes beneath the branches, all have a fatal attraction for it; it undergoes the mysterious infiltration of evil persuasions. Optical illusions, unexplained mirages, the terrors of the hour or of the place, throw man into this sort of fright, half-religious, half-bestial, which engenders in ordinary times, superstition, at violent epochs, brutality. Hallucinations hold the torch which lights the road to murder. The brigand is afflicted with a vertigo. Nature in her immensity has a double meaning which dazzles great minds and blinds savage souls. When man is ignorant, when his desert is peopled with visions, the obscurity of solitude is added to the obscurity of intelligence; hence come depths in the human soul black and profound as an abyss. Certain rocks, certain ravines, certain thickets, certain wild glimpses of night through the trees, drive men on to mad and fearful deeds. One might almost say that there are places which are the home of the spirit of evil.

How many tragic sights have been witnessed by the dark hill between Baignon and Plélan!

Vast horizons lead the soul on to wide, general ideas; circumscribed horizons engender narrow, one-sided conceptions, which condemn great hearts to be little; witness Jean Chouan.

Broad ideas are hated by narrow ideas; this is in fact the struggle of progress.

Neighborhood—Country, these two words sum up the whole of the Vendean war; a quarrel of the local idea against the universal idea. Peasants against patriots.

VII.

THE WAR OF THE VENDÉE RUINED BRITTANY

Brittany is an old rebel. Every time she revolted during two thousand years, she was in the right; but the last time, she was in the wrong. Still at the bottom, against the revolution as against the monarchy, against the acting representatives as against the governing dukes and peers, against the rule of assignats as against the sway of excise officers; whosoever might be the men that fought, Nicolas Rapin, François de La Noue, Captain Pluviant and the Lady of La Garnache, Stofflet, Coquereau and Lechandelier de Pierreville; under M. de Rohan against the king and under M. de la Rochejacquelein for the king, it was always the same war that Brittany waged, the war of the local spirit against the central.

Those ancient provinces were ponds; that stagnant water could not bear to flow; the wind which swept across did not purify, it stirred up. Finisterre formed the boundary of France, there the space given to man ended and the march of generations stopped. "Halt!" cried the ocean to the land, to barbarism and to civilization. Each time that the centre, Paris, gives an impulse, whether that impulse come from royalty or republicanism, whether it be in the interest of despotism or liberty, it is an innovation, and Brittany bristles up against it. "Leave us in peace. What is it they want of us?" The Marais seizes the pitchfork, the Bocage takes its carbine. All our attempts, our initiative in legislation and in education, our encyclopedias, our philosophies, our genius, our glories, all fail before the Houroux; the tocsin of Bazouges threatens the French Revolution, the moor of Faon rises in rebellion against the voice of our towns, and the bell of the Haut-des-Prés declares war against the Tower of the Louvre.

Terrible blindness!

The Vendean insurrection was a fatal misunderstanding.

A colossal blunder, a battle of titans, an immeasurable rebellion, destined to leave in history only these words, The Vendée, words illustrious yet dark; committing suicide for the absent, devoted to egotism, passing its time in making to cowardice the offer of a boundless bravery; without calculation, without strategy, without tactics, without plan, without aim, without chief, without responsibility; showing to what extent Will can be impotent; chivalric and savage; absurdity at its climax, a building up against the light of a barrier of black shadows; ignorance making against justice, against right, against reason, against deliverance, a long resistance at once idiotic and superb; the terror of eight years, the rendering desolate of fourteen departments, the devastation of fields, the destruction of harvests, the burning of villages, the ruin of cities, the pillage of houses, the massacre of women and children, the torch in the thatch, the sword in the heart, the terror of civilization, the hope of Mr. Pitt; such was this war, the unreasoning effort of the parricide.

In short, by proving the necessity of perforating in every direction the ancient darkness of Brittany, and piercing this thicket with arrows of light from every quarter at once, the Vendée served Progress. Catastrophes have a sombre fashion of arranging things.

PLUS QUAM CIVILIA BELLA

The summer of 1792 had been very rainy; the summer of 1793 was very dry and hot. In consequence of the civil war, there were no roads left, so to speak, in Brittany. Still it was possible to get about, thanks to the beauty of the season. Dry fields make an easy route.

At the close of a fine day in July, about an hour before sunset, a man on horseback, who came from the direction of Avranches, drew rein before the little inn called The Croix-Branchard, which stood on the outskirts of Pontorson, and which for years past had borne this inscription on its sign: "Good cider sold here." It had been warm all day, but the wind was now beginning to rise.

The traveler was enveloped in an ample cloak which covered the back of his horse. He wore a broad hat with a tricolored cockade, which was a bold thing to do in this country of hedges and gunshots where a cockade was a target. The cloak, fastened about his neck, was thrown back to leave his arms free, and beneath it could be seen a tri-colored sash and the handles of two pistols thrust into it. A sabre hung down below the cloak.

At the sound of the horse's hoofs, the door of the inn opened, and the landlord appeared, a lantern in his hand. It was the intermediate hour between day and night; still light on the highway, but dark in the house.

The host looked at the cockade.

"Citizen," said he, "do you stop here?"

"No."

"Where are you going then?"

"To Dol."

"In that case go back to Avranches or remain at Pontorson."

"Why?"

"Because there is fighting at Dol."

"Ah!" said the horseman.

Then he added: "Give my horse some oats."

The host brought the trough, emptied a measure of oats into it, and took the bridle off the horse, which began to snuff and eat.

The dialogue continued.

"Citizen, is that a horse of the requisition?"

"No."

"It belongs to you?"

"Yes. I bought and paid for it."

"Where do you come from?"

"Paris."

"Not direct?"

"No."

"I should think not, the roads are closed. But the mail-coach still runs."

"As far as Alençon. I left it there."

"Ah! very soon there will no longer be any mail-coaches in France. There are no more horses. A horse worth three hundred livres costs six hundred, and fodder is beyond all price. I have been postmaster, and now I am keeper of a cookshop. Of the thirteen hundred and thirteen postmasters that there used to be, two hundred have resigned. Citizen, you traveled according to the new tariff?"

"That of the first of May. Yes."

"Twenty sous a post in the inside carriage, twelve sous on top, five sous in the van. You bought your horse at Alençon?"

"Yes."

"You have ridden all day?"

"Since dawn."

"And yesterday?"

"And the day before."

"I can see that. You came by Domfront and Mortain."

"And Avranches."

"Take my advice, rest yourself, citizen. You must be tired. Your horse certainly is."

"Horses have a right to be tired, men have not."

The host again fixed his eyes on the traveler. It was a grave, calm, severe face, framed by gray hair.

The innkeeper cast a glance along the road, which was deserted as far as the eye could reach, and said:

"And you travel alone in this fashion?"

"I have an escort."

"Where is it?"

"My sabre and pistols."

The innkeeper brought a bucket of water, and, while the horse was drinking, he studied the traveler and said to himself:

"All the same, he has the look of a priest."

The horseman continued:

"You say there is fighting at Dol?"

"Yes. It ought to be about beginning."

"Who is fighting?"

"One ci-devant against another ci-devant."

"What did you say?"

"I say that a ci-devant who is for the Republic is fighting against another ci-devant who is for the king."

"But there is no longer a king."

"There is the little fellow. The odd part of the business is, that these two ci-devants are relations."

The horseman listened attentively. The innkeeper continued:

"One is young, the other is old. It is the grand-nephew who fights the great-uncle. The uncle is a royalist, the nephew is a patriot. The uncle commands the Whites, the nephew commands the Blues. Ah, they will show no quarter, I warrant you. It is a war to the death."

"To the death?"

"Yes, citizen. Wait! would you like to see the compliments they fling at each other's heads? Here is a notice the old man finds means to placard everywhere, on all the houses and all the trees, and that he has had stuck up on my very door."

The host held up his lantern to a square of paper fastened on a panel of the double door, and, as the placard was written in large characters, the traveler, as he sat on his horse, could read:

"The Marquis de Lantenac has the honor of informing his grand-nephew, the Vicomte Gauvain, that, if Monsieur le Marquis has the good fortune to seize his person, he will cause Monsieur le Vicomte to be decently shot."

"And," added the host, "here is the reply."

He turned, and threw the light of the lantern upon a second placard placed on a level with the first upon the other half of the door. The traveler read :

"Gauvain warns Lantenac that if he take him he will have him shot."

"Yesterday," said the host, "the first placard was stuck on my door, and this morning the second. There was no need of waiting for the answer."

The traveler in a low voice, and as if speaking to himself, uttered these words, which the innkeeper heard without really understanding them :

"Yes, this is more than war in the country, it is war in families. It is necessary, and it is well. The grand restoration of the people must be bought at this price."

And the traveler, with his eyes still fixed on the second placard, raised his hand to his hat and saluted it.

The host continued :

"So, citizen, you see how the matter lies. In the cities and the large towns we are for the Revolution, in the country they are against it ; that is to say, in the towns people are Frenchmen, and in the villages they are Bretons. It is a war of the townspeople against the peasants. They call us clowns, we call them boors. The nobles and the priests are with them."

"Not all," interrupted the horseman.

"Certainly not, citizen, since we have here a vicomte against a marquis."

And he added to himself:

"And I feel sure I am speaking to a priest."

The horseman continued:

"And which of the two has the best of it?"

"The vicomte so far. But he has to work hard. The old man is a tough one. They belong to the Gauvain family, nobles of these parts. It is a family with two branches; there is the great branch, whose chief is called the Marquis de Lantenac, and there is the lesser branch, whose head is called the Vicomte Gauvain. To-day the two branches are fighting each other. One does not see that among trees, but one sees it among men. This Marquis de Lantenac is all-powerful in Brittany; the peasants consider him a prince. The very day he landed, eight thousand men joined him; in a week, three hundred parishes had risen. If he had been able to get a foothold on the coast, the English would have landed. Luckily this Gauvain was at hand, the other's grand-nephew, a curious circumstance. He is the Republican commander, and he has checkmated his great-uncle. And then, as good luck would have it, when this Lantenac arrived and was massacring a heap of prisoners, he had two women shot, one of whom had three children who had been adopted by a Parisian battalion. Then they became a terrible battalion. They call themselves the Battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge. There are not many of those Parisians left, but they are furious bayonets. They have been incorporated into the division of Commandant Gauvain. Nothing can stand against them. They mean to avenge the women and retake the children. Nobody knows what the old man has done with the little ones. That is what enraged the Parisian grenadiers. Suppose those children had not been mixed up in the matter, the war would not be what it is. The vicomte is a good and brave young man. But the old fellow is a terrible marquis. The peasants call it the war of Saint Michel against Beelzebub. You know, perhaps, that Saint Michel is an angel of the district. There is a mountain named after him out in the bay. They say he overcame the demon, and buried him under another mountain near here, which is called Tombelaine."

"Yes," murmured the horseman, "Tumba Beleni, the tomb of Belenus, Bel, Belial, Beelzebub."

"I see that you are well informed."

And the host again said to himself: "There is no doubt about it, he understands Latin, he is a priest."

Then he continued:

"Well, citizen, for the peasants it is that war beginning over again. For them the Royalist general is Saint Michel, and Beelzebub is the Republican commander. But if there is a devil, it is certainly Lantenac, and if there is an angel, it is Gauvain. You will take nothing, citizen?"

"I have my gourd and a bit of bread. But you do not tell me what is happening at Dol!"

"This is it. Gauvain commands the exploring column of the coast. Lantenac's aim was to rouse a general insurrection, and sustain Lower Brittany by the aid of Lower Normandy, open the door to Pitt, and give a shove forward to the great Vendean army with twenty thousand English and two hundred thousand peasants. Gauvain cut this plan short. He holds the coast, and he drives Lantenac into the interior and the English into the sea. Lantenac was here, and Gauvain has dislodged him; has taken from him the Pont-au-Beau; has driven him out of Avranches, chased him out of Villedieu, and kept him from reaching Granville. He is manœuvring to shut him up again in the forest of Fougères, and to surround him there. Everything was going well yesterday. Gauvain was here with his division. All of a sudden, look you. The old man, who is skillful, made a point; information comes that he has marched on Dol. If he take Dol, and establishes a battery on Mount Dol, for he has cannon, then there will be a place on the coast where the English can land, and everything is lost. That is why, as there was not a minute to lose, that Gauvain, who is a man with a head, took counsel with nobody but himself, asked no orders and waited for none, but sounded the signal to saddle, harnessed his artillery, collected his troop, drew his sabre, and, while Lantenac throws himself on Dol, Gauvain throws himself on Lantenac. It is at Dol that these two Breton heads will knock together. There will be a fine clash. They are at it now."

"How long does it take to get to Dol?"

"At least three hours for a troop with cannon; but they are there now."

The traveler listened, and said:

"That's so, I think I hear the cannon."

The host listened.

"Yes, citizen. And the musketry. They have opened the ball. You would do well to pass the night here. There will be nothing good to catch over there."

"I cannot stop. I must keep on my road."

"You are wrong. I do not know your business, but the risk is great, and, unless it concern what you hold dearest in the world . . ."

"In truth, it is that which is concerned," said the traveler.

"Something like your son . . ."

"Very nearly that," said the traveler.

The innkeeper raised his head, and said to himself:

"Still this citizen gives me the impression of being a priest."

Then, after a little reflection:

"After all, a priest may have children."

"Put the bridle on my horse," said the traveler. "How much do I owe you?"

And he paid the man.

The host set the trough and the bucket back against the wall and returned to the horseman.

"Since you are determined to go, listen to my advice. It is clear that you are going to Saint-Malo. Well, do not go by way of Dol. There are two roads; the road through Dol, and the road along the sea-shore. There is scarcely any difference in their length. The sea-shore road passes by Saint-Georges de Brehaigne, Cherrueix, and Hirel-le-Vivier. You leave Dol to the south and Cancale to the north. Citizen, at the end of the street you will find the branching off of the two roads; that to Dol is on the left, that to Saint-Georges de Brehaigne on the right. Listen well to me, if you go by Dol, you will get into the thick of the fight. That is why you must not go to the left, but to the right."

"Thanks," said the traveler.

And he spurred his horse.

It was now quite dark, he hurried on into the night.

The innkeeper lost sight of him.

When the traveler reached the end of the street where the two roads branched off, he heard the voice of the innkeeper calling to him from the distance:

"Turn to the right!"

He turned to the left.

II.

DOL

Dol, a Spanish town of France in Brittany, as the guide-books style it, is not a town, it is a street. A great old Gothic street, bordered all the way on the right and on the left by houses with pillars, placed irregularly, so that they form nooks and elbows in the street, which is nevertheless very wide. The rest of the town is only a network of lanes, attaching themselves to this great diametrical street and emptying into it like brooks into a river. The city, without gates or walls, open, overlooked by Mount Dol, could not have sustained a siege; but the street might have sustained one. The promontories of the houses, which were still to be seen fifty years back, and the two pillared galleries which bordered the street, made a position that was very strong and capable of offering great resistance. Each house was a fortress and it would be necessary to take them one after another. The old market was very nearly in the middle of the street.

The innkeeper of the Croix-Branchard had spoken truly, a mad struggle filled Dol at the moment he spoke the words. A duel in the darkness between the Whites, that morning arrived, and the Blues, who had come upon them in the evening, burst suddenly over the town. The forces were unequal, the Whites numbered six thousand, there were only fifteen hundred of the Blues, but there was equality in point of obstinate rage. Strange to say, it was the fifteen hundred who had attacked the six thousand.

On one side a mob, on the other a phalanx. On one side, six thousand peasants, with hearts of Jesus embroidered on their leather vests, white ribbons on their round hats, Christian devices on their cuffs, chaplets at their belts, carrying more pitchforks than sabres and carbines without bayonets, dragging cannon with ropes, badly equipped, ill disciplined, poorly armed, but frantic. In opposition to them, fifteen hundred soldiers, wearing three-cornered hats, with tricolored cockades, coats with large tails and wide lapels, shoulder-belts crossed, copper-hilted swords and guns with long bayonets, trained, skilled; docile, yet fierce, obeying like men who would know how to command, volunteers also, shoeless and in rags, but volunteers for their country; on the side of Monarchy, peasants who were paladins; for the Revolution, barefooted heroes; and each troop possessing a soul in its leader; the royalists having an old man, the republicans a young one. On one side, Lantenac, on the other, Gauvain.

The Revolution, side by side with its faces of youthful giants, such as Danton, Saint-Just, and Robespierre, has faces of ideal youth, like those of Hoche and Marceau. Gauvain was one of these.

Gauvain was thirty years old, he had a Herculean bust, the solemn eye of a prophet and the laugh of a child. He did not smoke, he did not drink, he did not swear. He carried a dressing-case through the whole war; he took great care of his nails, his teeth, and his hair, which was dark and luxuriant; and during halts he himself shook in the wind his military coat, riddled with bullets and white with dust. Though always rushing headlong into an affray, he had never been wounded. His singularly sweet voice had at command the harsh imperiousness needed by a leader. He set the example of sleeping on the ground, in the wind, the rain, and the snow, rolled in his cloak and with his noble head pillowed on a stone. His was a heroic and innocent soul. The sabre in his hand transfigured him. He had that effeminate air which in battle is formidable.

With all that, a thinker and a philosopher, a youthful sage; Alcibiades in appearance, Socrates in speech.

In that immense improvisation, the French Revolution, this young man had at once become a leader.

His division, formed by himself, was like a Roman legion, a kind of complete little army; it was composed of infantry and cavalry; it had its scouts, its pioneers, its sappers, pontooners; and, as a Roman legion had its catapults, this one had its cannon. Three pieces, well mounted, rendered the column strong, while leaving it easy to handle.

Lantenac was also a thorough soldier, a more consummate one. He was at the same time wary and hardy. The real old heroes have more cold determination than young ones, because they are far removed from the warmth of life's morning, and more audacity, because they are nearer to death. What have they to lose? so very little. Hence the manœuvres of Lantenac were at once more rash and more skillful. But in the main, and almost always, in this dogged hand-to-hand conflict between the old man and the young, Gauvain gained the advantage. It was rather the work of fortune than anything else. All good luck, even successes which are in themselves terrible, go to youth. Victory is feminine.

Lantenac was exasperated against Gauvain; in the first place, because Gauvain fought against him, in the second place, because he was of his kindred. What did he mean by turning Jacobin? This Gauvain! This mischievous dog! his heir, for the marquis had no children, his grand-nephew, almost his grandson! "Ah!" said this quasi-grandfather, "if I put my hand on him, I will kill him like a dog!"

For that matter, the Revolution had reason to be alarmed about this Marquis de Lantenac. An earthquake followed his landing. His name spread through the Vendean insurrection like a train of powder, and Lantenac at once became the centre. In a revolt of that nature, where each is jealous of the other and each has his thicket or ravine, the arrival of a superior rallies the scattered leaders who have been equals among themselves. Nearly all the forest captains had joined Lantenac, and, whether near or far, they obeyed him.

One man alone had departed, it was the first who had joined him, Gavard. Wherefore? Because he had been a man of trust. Gavard had known all the secrets and adopted all the plans of the ancient system of civil war when Lantenac appeared to replace and supplant him. One does not inherit from a man of trust; the shoe of La Rouarie did not fit Lantenac. Gavard departed to join Bonchamp.

Lantenac, as a military man, belonged to the school of Frederick II.; he understood how to combine the great war with the little. He would have neither a "confused mass," like the great Catholic and royal army, a crowd destined to be crushed, nor a troop of guerrillas scattered among the hedges and copses, good to harass, impotent to destroy. Guerrilla warfare finishes nothing, or finishes badly; it begins by attacking a republic and ends by rifling a diligence. Lantenac did not comprehend this Breton war as the other chiefs had done; neither all for open country campaigns, like La Rochejacquelein, nor all for the forest, like Jean Chouan; neither Vendée nor Chouannerie; he wanted real warfare; to make use of the peasant, but to depend on the soldier. He wanted bands for strategy and regiments for tactics. He found these village armies admirable for attack, for ambush and surprise, quickly gathered, quickly dispersed, but he felt that they lacked solidity; they were like water in his hand; he wanted in this floating and diffused war to create a solid base; he wanted to join to the savage army of the forests regularly drilled troops that would make a pivot about which he could manœuvre the peasants. A profound and terrible conception; if it had succeeded, the Vendée would have been unconquerable.

But where to find regular troops? where to find soldiers? where to find regiments? where discover an army ready made? In England. Hence Lantenac's determined idea, to land the English. Thus the conscience of parties compromises with itself; the white cockade hid the red uniform from his sight. Lantenac had only one thought: to get possession of some point on the coast and deliver it up to Pitt. That was why, seeing Dol defenseless, he had flung himself upon it; the town of Dol would give him Mount Dol, and Mount Dol the coast.

The place was well chosen. The cannon of Mount Dol would sweep the Fresnois on one side and Saint-Brelade on the other; would keep the cruisers of Cancale at a distance and leave the whole beach, from Raz-sur-Couesnon to Saint-Mêloir-des-Ondes, clear for an invasion.

For the carrying out of this decisive attempt, Lantenac had brought with him only a little over six thousand men, the flower of the bands which he had at his disposal, and all his artillery, ten sixteen-pound culverins, a demi-culverin, and a four-pounder. His idea was to establish a strong battery on Mount Dol, upon the principle that a thousand shots fired from ten cannon do more execution than fifteen hundred fired from five.

Success appeared certain. They were six thousand men. Toward Avranches, they had only Gauvain and his fifteen hundred men to fear, and Léchelle in the direction of Dinan. Léchelle, it was true, had twenty-five thousand men, but he was twenty leagues away. So Lantenac felt reassured, on Léchelle's side he put the great distance against the great numbers; with Gauvain, the size of the force against their nearness. Let us add that Léchelle was an idiot, who, later on, allowed his twenty-five thousand men to be exterminated in the wilds of the Croix-Bataille, a blunder which he atoned for by suicide.

So Lantenac felt perfectly secure. His entrance into Dol was sudden and impetuous. The Marquis de Lantenac had a stern reputation; he was known to be without pity. No resistance was attempted. The terrified inhabitants barricaded themselves in their houses. The six thousand Vendeans installed themselves in the town with rustic confusion; it was almost like a fair-ground, without quartermasters, without allotted camp, bivouacking at hazard, cooking in the open air, wandering among the churches, forsaking their guns for their rosaries. Lantenac went in haste with some artillery officers to reconnoitre Mount Dol, leaving the command to Gouge-le-Bruant, whom he had appointed field-sergeant.

This Gouge-le-Bruant has left a faint trace in history. He had two nicknames, Brise-Bleu, on account of his massacre of republicans, and Imânus, because he had in him a something that was indescribably horrible. Imânus, derived from immanis, is an old bas-Norman word which expresses superhuman ugliness, something almost divine in its awfulness, a demon, a satyr, an ogre. An ancient manuscript says: "d'mes dœux iers j'vis l'imânus." (With my two eyes I saw Imânus.) The old people of the Bocage no longer know to-day who Gouge-le-Bruant was, nor what Brise-Bleu signifies; but they know, confusedly, Imânus; Imânus is mingled with the local superstitions. They still talk of Imânus at Trémorel and at Plumaugat, two villages where Gouge-le-Bruant has left the trace of his sinister course. In the Vendée the others were savages, Gouge-le-Bruant was the barbarian. He was a sort of cazique, tattooed with Christian crosses and fleur-de-lis; he had on his face the hideous, almost supernatural glare of a soul which no other human soul resembled. He was infernally brave in battle; atrocious afterward. His was a heart full of tortuous intricacies, capable of all forms of devotion, inclined to all madnesses. Did he reason? Yes; but as serpents crawl, in a twisted fashion. He started at heroism to reach murder. It was impossible to divine whence his resolves came to him, they were sometimes grand from their very monstrosity. He was capable of every possible unexpected horror. His ferocity was epic.

Hence his mysterious nickname, Imânus.

The Marquis de Lantenac had confidence in his cruelty.

It was true that Imânus excelled in cruelty; but in strategy and tactics he was less clever, and perhaps the marquis erred in making him his field-sergeant. However that might be, he left Imânus behind him with instructions to act in his place and look after everything.

Gouge-le-Bruant, a man more of a fighter than a soldier, was fitter to cut the throats of a clan than to guard a town. Still he posted the sentries.

When evening came, as the Marquis de Lantenac was returning toward Dol, after having decided upon the ground for his projected battery, he suddenly heard the report of cannon. He looked. A red smoke was rising from the principal street. There had been a surprise, an attack, an assault; they were fighting in the town.

Although not easily astonished, he was stupefied. He had not been prepared for anything of the sort. Who could it be? Evidently it was not Gauvain. No man would attack a force that numbered four to his one. Was it Léchelle? But could he have made such a forced march? Léchelle was improbable. Gauvain, impossible.

Lantenac urged on his horse; as he rode forward he encountered the flying inhabitants; he questioned them, they were mad with terror. They cried: "The Blues! the Blues!" and when he arrived, the situation was desperate.

This is what had happened.

III.

SMALL ARMIES AND GREAT BATTLES

As we have just seen, the peasants, on arriving at Dol, had dispersed through the town, each man following his own fancy, as happens when troops "obey from friendship," a favorite expression with the Vendeans. A sort of obedience which makes heroes, but not troopers. They had thrust the artillery out of the way along with the baggage, under the arches of the old market-hall, and, weary, eating, drinking, counting their beads, they had lain down pell-mell across the principal street, which was encumbered rather than guarded. As night came on, the greater portion fell asleep, with their heads on their knapsacks, some having their wives beside them; for the peasant women often followed their husbands; in the Vendée, the robust ones acted as spies. It was a mild evening in July; the constellations glittered in the dark blue of the heavens. The entire bivouac, which resembled rather the halt of a caravan than an army encamped, gave itself up to repose. Suddenly, in the dim light of twilight, such as had not yet closed their eyes saw three pieces of cannon in position at the entrance of the main street.

It was Gauvain. He had surprised the sentinels. He was in the town, and his column held the top of the street.

A peasant started up, cried: "Who goes there?" and fired his musket; a cannon-shot replied. Then a furious discharge of musketry burst forth. The whole drowsy crowd sprang up with a start. A rude shock. To fall asleep under the stars and wake under a volley of grape-shot.

The first moments were terrible. There is nothing so tragic as the aimless swarming of a thunder-stricken crowd. They flung themselves on their arms. They yelled, they ran; many fell. The bewildered peasants no longer knew what they were about, and blindly shot one another. The townspeople, stunned with fright, rushed in and out of their houses, and wandered frantically amid the hubbub. Families shrieked to one another. A fearful struggle, in which women and children were mingled. The balls, as they whistled overhead, streaked the darkness with rays of light. A fusillade poured from every dark corner. There was nothing but smoke and tumult.

The entanglement of the baggage-wagons and the cannon-carriages was added to the confusion. The horses became unmanageable. The wounded were trampled under foot. The groans of the poor wretches, helpless on the ground, filled the air. Horror here, stupefaction there. Soldiers and officers sought for one another. In the midst of all this could be seen creatures made indifferent to the awful scene by personal pre-occupations. A woman sat nursing her new-born babe, seated on a bit of wall, against which leaned her husband with his leg broken, and he, while his blood was flowing, calmly loaded his carbine and fired at random, straight before him into the darkness. Men lying flat on the ground fired between the spokes of the wagon-wheels. At times there rose a hideous din of cries. The great voice of the cannon drowned all. It was awful.

It was like a felling of trees; they dropped one upon another. Gauvain, from his ambush, poured out a deadly fire and suffered little loss.

Still the peasants, courageous amid their disorder, ended by putting themselves on the defensive; they retreated into the market, a vast, obscure redoubt, a forest of stone pillars. There they again made a stand; anything which resembled a wood gave them confidence. Imânus to the best of his ability supplied the absence of Lantenac. They had cannon, but, to the great astonishment of Gauvain, they did not make use of it; that was owing to the fact that the artillery officers had gone with the marquis to reconnoitre Mount Dol, and the peasants did not know how to manage the culverins and demi-culverins; but they riddled with balls the Blues who cannonaded them. The peasants replied to the grape-shot by volleys of musketry. It was now they who were sheltered. They had heaped together the drays, the casks, the boxes, all the litter of the old market, and improvised a lofty barricade, with openings through which they could pass their carbines. From these holes their fire was murderous. The whole was quickly arranged. In a quarter of an hour the market presented an impregnable front.

This became a serious matter for Gauvain. This market suddenly transformed into a citadel was unexpected. The peasants were inside it, massed and solid. Gauvain had succeeded in his surprise but failed in the defeat. He had dismounted. He stood attentively, his arms folded, clutching his sword in one hand, erect, in the glare of a torch which lighted his battery, studying the darkness.

The light, falling on his tall figure, made him visible to the men behind the barricade. He became an aim for them, but he did not notice it.

The shower of balls sent out from the barricade fell about him as he stood there, lost in thought.

But he could oppose cannon to all these carbines, and the cannon always ends by getting the advantage. Victory rests with him who has the artillery. His battery, well manned, insured him the superiority.

Suddenly a lightning-flash burst from the shadowy market; there was a sound like a peal of thunder, and a ball broke through the house above Gauvain's head.

The barricade was replying to the cannon with cannon.

What had happened? Something new had occurred. The artillery was no longer confined to one side.

A second ball followed the first and buried itself in the wall close to Gauvain. A third knocked his hat on the ground.

These balls were of a heavy calibre. It was a sixteen-pounder that was being fired.

"They are aiming at you, commandant," cried the artillerymen.

And they extinguished the torch. Gauvain, as if in a dream, picked up his hat.

Some one had in fact aimed at Gauvain, it was Lantenac.

The marquis had just arrived within the barricade from the opposite side.

Imânus had hurried to meet him.

"Monseigneur, we are surprised."

"By whom?"

"I do not know."

"Is the route to Dinan free?"

"I think so."

"We must begin a retreat."

"It has commenced. A good many have run away."

"We must not run; we must fall back. Why are you not making use of this artillery?"

"The men lost their heads; besides, the officers were not here."

"I am come."

"Monseigneur, I have sent to Fougères all I could of the baggage, the women, everything useless. What is to be done with the three little prisoners?"

"Ah! those children!"

"Yes."

"They are our hostages. Have them taken to La Tourgue."

This said, the marquis rushed to the barricade. With the arrival of the chief the whole face of affairs changed. The barricade was ill-constructed for artillery, there was only room for two cannon; the marquis put in position a couple of sixteen-pounders, for which loopholes were made. As he leaned over one of the guns, watching the enemy's battery through the opening, he perceived Gauvain.

"It is he!" cried he.

Then he himself took the swab and rammer, loaded the piece, sighted it, and fired.

Thrice he aimed at Gauvain and missed. The third time he only succeeded in knocking off his hat.

"Clumsy!" muttered Lantenac: "a little lower, and I should have taken his head."

Suddenly the torch went out, and he had only darkness before him.

"So be it," said he.

And turning toward the peasant gunners, he cried:

"Now let them have it."

Gauvain, on his side, was not less in earnest. The seriousness of the situation increased. A new phase of the combat developed itself. The barricade had begun to use cannon. Who could tell if it were not about to pass from the defensive to the offensive? He had before him, after deducting the killed and the fugitives, at least five thousand, and he had left only twelve hundred serviceable men.

What would happen to the Republicans if the enemy perceived their paucity of numbers? The rôles would be reversed. He had been the assailant, he would become the assailed. If the barricade were to make a sortie, everything might be lost.

What was to be done? He could no longer think of attacking the barricade in front; an attempt at main force would be foolhardy; twelve hundred men cannot dislodge five thousand. To rush upon them was impossible; to wait would be fatal. He must make an end. But how?

Gauvain belonged to the neighborhood; he was acquainted with the town; he knew that the old market-house where the Vendeans were intrenched was backed by a labyrinth of narrow and crooked streets.

He turned toward his lieutenant, who was that valiant Captain Guéchamp, afterward famous for clearing out the forest of Concise where Jean Chouan was born, and for preventing the capture of Bourgneuf by holding the dike of La Chaîne against the rebels.

"Guéchamp," said he, "I leave you in command. Fire as fast as you can. Riddle the barricade with cannon-balls. Keep all those fellows over yonder busy."

"I understand," said Guéchamp.

"Mass the whole column with their guns loaded, and hold them ready to attack."

He added a few words in Guéchamp's ear.

"I hear," said Guéchamp.

Gauvain resumed: "Are all our drummers on foot?"

"Yes."

"We have nine. Keep two, and give me seven."

The seven drummers ranged themselves in silence in front of Gauvain.

Then Gauvain cried:

"Battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge!"

Twelve men, of whom one was a sergeant, stepped out from the main body of the troop.

"I want the whole battalion," said Gauvain.

"Here it is," replied the sergeant.

"You are twelve!"

"There are twelve of us left."

"It is well," said Gauvain.

This sergeant was the good, rude trooper Radoub, who had adopted, in the name of the battalion, the three children they had found in the wood of La Saudraie.

It will be remembered that only a demi-battalion had been exterminated at Herbe-en-Pail, and Radoub was fortunate enough not to have been among the number.

There was a forage-wagon standing near; Gauvain pointed toward it with his finger.

"Sergeant, order your men to make some straw ropes and let them twist this straw about their guns, so that there will be no noise if they knock together."

A minute passed, the order was silently executed in the darkness.

"It is done," said the sergeant.

"Soldiers, take off your shoes," commanded Gauvain.

"We have none," returned the sergeant.

They numbered, counting the drummers, nineteen men; Gauvain made the twentieth.

He cried:

"Single file. Follow me. The drummers next to me. The battalion behind them. Sergeant, you will command the battalion."

He put himself at the head of the column, and, while the firing on both sides continued, these twenty men, gliding along like shadows, plunged into the deserted lanes.

The line marched thus for some time, winding along between the houses. The whole town seemed dead; the citizens were hidden in their cellars. Every door was barred, every shutter closed. No light to be seen anywhere.

Amid this silence the principal street kept up its furious din; the cannonading continued; the republican battery and the royalist barricade spit forth their volleys with undiminished fury.

After twenty minutes of this tortuous march, Gauvain who kept his way unerringly through the darkness, reached the end of a lane which led into the main street; but on the other side of the market-house.

The situation was altered. On this side there was no intrenchment, according to the eternal imprudence of the builders of barricades, the market was open and the entrance free among the pillars where some baggage-wagons stood ready to depart. Gauvain and his nineteen men had the five thousand Vendeans before them, but their backs instead of their faces.

Gauvain spoke in a low voice to the sergeant; the soldiers untwisted the straw from their guns; the twelve grenadiers posted themselves in line behind the angle of the lane, and the seven drummers, with their drumsticks lifted, waited.

The artillery firing was intermittent. Suddenly, in a pause between the discharges, Gauvain waved his sword, and, in a voice which rang like a trumpet through the silence, cried:

"Two hundred men to the right, two hundred men to the left, all the rest in the centre!"

The twelve muskets fired, and the seven drums beat the charge.

And Gauvain uttered the formidable battle-cry of the Blues:

"To your bayonets! Down upon them!"

The effect was marvelous.

This whole peasant mass felt itself surprised in the rear, and believed that it had another army at its back. At the same instant, on hearing the drums, the column which Guéchamp commanded at the head of the street began to move, sounding the charge in turn, and flung itself at a run on the barricade; the peasants found themselves between two fires; a panic magnifies in moments of terror, a pistol-shot sounds like the report of a cannon, the imagination heightens every noise, and the barking of a dog sounds like the roar of a lion. Add to this the fact that the peasant catches fright as easily as a thatch catches fire, and, as quickly as a blazing thatch becomes a conflagration, so a panic among peasants becomes a rout. An indescribably confused flight ensued.

In a few minutes the market was empty, the terrified rustics broke away in all directions, the officers were powerless. Imânus uselessly killed two or three fugitives, nothing was to be heard but the cry: "Save yourselves!" and the army, pouring through the streets of the town like water through the holes of a sieve, dispersed into the open country with the rapidity of a cloud carried along by a whirlwind.

Some fled toward Châteauneuf, some toward Plerguer, others toward Antrain.

The Marquis de Lantenac watched this stampede. He spiked the guns with his own hands and then retreated, the last of all, slowly, composedly, saying to himself:—"Decidedly, the peasants will not stand. We must have the English."

IV.

IT IS THE SECOND TIME

The victory was complete.

Gauvain turned toward the men of the battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge, and said:

"You are twelve, but you are equal to a thousand."

Praise from a chief was the cross of honor of those days.

Guéchamp, dispatched beyond the town by Gauvain, pursued the fugitives and captured a great number.

Torches were lighted and the town was searched.

All who could not escape surrendered. They lit up the principal street with fire-pots. It was strewn with dead and dying. The root of a fight must always be torn out, a few desperate groups here and there still resisted, they were surrounded, and threw down their arms.

Gauvain had noticed, amid the frantic pell-mell of the retreat, a brave man, a sort of agile and robust form, who had covered the retreat of others, but had not himself fled. This peasant had used his gun so energetically, the barrel for firing, the butt-end for knocking down, that he had broken it; now he grasped a pistol in one hand and a sabre in the other. No one dared approach him. Suddenly Gauvain saw him reel and support himself against a pillar of the main street. The man had just been wounded. But he still clutched the sabre and pistol in his hands. Gauvain put his sword under his arm and went up to him.

"Surrender," said he.

The man looked steadily at him. The blood ran through his clothing from a wound which he had received, and made a pool at his feet.

"You are my prisoner," added Gauvain.

The man remained silent.

"What is your name?"

The man answered:

"I am called the Shadow-dancer."

"You are a brave man," said Gauvain.

And he held out his hand.

The man cried:

"Long live the King!"

And gathering up all his remaining strength, he raised both arms at once, fired his pistol at Gauvain's heart, and dealt a blow at his head with the sabre.

He did it with the swiftness of a tiger; but some one else had been still more swift. This was a man on horseback, who had arrived unobserved a few minutes before. This man, seeing the Vendean raise the sabre and pistol, rushed between him and Gauvain. But for this interposition, Gauvain would have been killed. The horse received the pistol-shot, the man received the sabre-stroke, and both fell. It all happened in the time it would have needed to utter a cry.

The Vendean sank on his side upon the pavement.

The sabre had struck the man full in the face; he lay senseless on the stones. The horse was killed.

Gauvain approached.

"Who is this man?" said he.

He looked closely at him. The blood from the gash flowed over the wounded man and hid his face with a red mask. It was impossible to distinguish his features. One could see that his hair was gray.

"This man has saved my life," continued Gauvain. "Does any one here know him?"

"Commandant," said a soldier, "this man came into the town a few minutes ago. I saw him arrive. He came by the road from Pontorson."

The surgeon-in-chief hurried up with his instrument-case. The wounded man was still insensible. The surgeon examined him and said:

"A simple gash. It is nothing. It can be sewed up. In a week he will be on his feet again. It was a beautiful sabre-stroke."

The wounded man wore a cloak, a tri-colored sash, pistols, and a sabre. He was laid on a litter. They undressed him. A bucket of fresh water was brought, the surgeon washed the cut. The face began to be visible. Gauvain studied it attentively.

"Has he any papers on him?" asked he.

The surgeon felt in the stranger's side-pocket and drew out a pocket-book, which he handed to Gauvain.

In the meantime the wounded man, revived by the cold water, regained consciousness. His eyelids moved slightly.

Gauvain examined the pocket-book; he found in it a sheet of paper, folded in four, he opened this and read:

"Committee of Public Safety. The citizen Cimourdain ! . . ."

He uttered a cry:

"Cimourdain !"

At this cry, the wounded man opened his eyes.

Gauvain was frantic with joy.

"Cimourdain! it is you! This is the second time you have saved my life."

Cimourdain looked at him. A gleam of ineffable happiness lighted up his bleeding face.

Gauvain fell on his knees beside the wounded man, crying:

"My master!"

"Thy father," said Cimourdain.

V.

THE DROP OF COLD WATER

They had not met for many years, but their hearts had never been parted; they recognized each other as if they had separated the evening before.

A hospital had been improvised in the town-hall of Dol. Cimourdain was placed on a bed in a little room next the great common chamber of the other wounded. The surgeon, who had sewed up the cut, put an end to the demonstrations of affection between the two men, judging that Cimourdain ought to be left to sleep. Besides, Gauvain was claimed by the thousand occupations which are the duties and cares of victory. Cimourdain remained alone; but he did not sleep; he was consumed by two fevers, the fever of his wound and of his joy.

He did not sleep, and still it did not seem to himself that he was awake. Could it be possible? was his dream realized? Cimourdain had long ceased to believe that such happiness could come to him, yet here it was. He had again found Gauvain. He had left him a child, he found him a man; he found him great, formidable, fearless. He found him triumphant, and triumphing for the people. Gauvain was the real support of the Revolution in the Vendée, and it was he, Cimourdain, who had given this tower of strength to the Republic. This victor was his pupil. The light which he saw illuminating this youthful face, reserved perhaps for the Republican Pantheon, was his own thought, his, Cimourdain's; his disciple, the child of his spirit, was henceforth a hero and would before long be a glory; it seemed to Cimourdain that he saw the apotheosis of his own soul. He had just seen how Gauvain made war; he was like Chiron, who had watched Achilles fight. A mysterious analogy between the priest and the centaur; for the priest is only half-man.

All the chances of this adventure, mingled with the sleeplessness caused by his wound, filled Cimourdain with a sort of mysterious intoxication. He saw a glorious youthful destiny rising, and, that which added to his great joy was the possession of full power over this destiny; another success like that which he had just witnessed, and Cimourdain would only need to speak a single word to induce the Republic to intrust an army to Gauvain. Nothing dazzles like the astonishment of complete victory. It was an era when each man had his military dream; each wished to create a general; Danton wished to appoint Westermann, Marat wished to appoint Rossignol, Hébert wished to appoint Ronsin, Robespierre wished to put aside all these. Why not Gauvain? asked Cimourdain of himself; and he dreamed. All possibilities were before him; he passed from one hypothesis to another; all obstacles vanished; when a man puts his foot on that ladder, he does not stop, it is an infinite ascent, one starts at man and one reaches the stars. A great general is only a leader of armies; a great captain is at the same time a leader of ideas; Cimourdain dreamed of Gauvain as a great captain. He seemed to see, for reverie travels swiftly, Gauvain on the ocean, defeating the English; on the Rhine, chastising the kings of the North; on the Pyrenees, repulsing Spain; on the Alps, making a signal to Rome to rouse herself. There were in Cimourdain two men, one tender, the other stern; both were satisfied; for, as the inexorable was his ideal, at the same time that he saw Gauvain noble, he saw him terrible. Cimourdain thought of all that it was necessary to destroy before beginning to build up, and said to himself: "Verily, this is no time for tendernesses. Gauvain will be à la hauteur ('up to the mark')", an expression of that time. Cimourdain pictured Gauvain spurning the shadows with his foot, with a breastplate of light, a meteor-glare on his brow, rising on the great idealistic wings of Justice, Reason, and Progress, but with a sword in his hand; an angel, but a destroyer.

In the height of this reverie which was almost an ecstasy, he heard, through the half-open door, a conversation in the large hospital hall, which was next his room; he recognized Gauvain's voice; through all those years of separation, that voice had ever sounded in his ear, and the voice of the man had still the tone of the childish voice he had loved. He listened. There was a sound of footsteps. One of the men was saying:

"Commandant, this is the man who fired at you. While nobody was watching, he dragged himself into a cellar. We found him. Here he is."

Then Cimourdain heard this dialogue between Gauvain and the man:

"You are wounded?"

"I am well enough to be shot."

"Lay that man on a bed. Dress his wounds, take care of him, cure him."

"I wish to die."

"You must live. You tried to kill me in the name of the King; I show you mercy in the name of the Republic."

A shadow passed across Cimourdain's forehead. He was like a man waking up with a start, and he murmured with a sort of terrible sadness:

"In truth, he is merciful."

VI.

A HEALED BREAST, A BLEEDING HEART

A cut heals quickly; but there was in a certain place one more seriously wounded than Cimourdain. It was the woman who had been shot, whom the beggar Tellmarch had picked up out of the great lake of blood at the farm of Herbe-en-Pail.

Michelle Fléchard was in an even more critical situation than Tellmarch had believed; there was a wound in the shoulder-blade corresponding to the wound above the breast; at the same time that the ball broke her collar-bone, another ball pierced her shoulder; but, as the lung had not been touched, she might recover. Tellmarch was a "philosopher," a peasant phrase which means a little of a doctor, a little of a surgeon and a little of a sorcerer. He carried the wounded woman to his forest den, laid her upon his seaweed bed, and treated her by the aid of those mysterious things called "simples," and, thanks to him, she lived.

The collar-bone knitted together, the wounds in the breast and shoulder closed; after a few weeks, she was convalescent.

One morning she was able to walk out of the den, leaning on Tellmarch; she seated herself beneath the trees in the sunshine. Tellmarch knew little about her, wounds in the breast demand silence, and, during the almost death-like agony which had preceded her recovery, she had scarcely spoken a word. When she tried to speak, Tellmarch stopped her; but she was always thinking, and Tellmarch could see in her eyes the sombre going and coming of sad memories. This morning she was quite strong, she could almost walk alone; a cure is a paternity, and Tellmarch watched her with delight. The good old man began to smile. He said to her:

"Well, we are upon our feet again. We have no wounds now."

"Except in the heart," said she.

She added:

"You have no idea then where they are."

"Who are 'they?'" asked Tellmarch.

"My children."

This "then" expressed a whole world of thoughts; it signified: "since you do not talk to me, since you have been so many days beside me without opening your mouth, since each time I attempt to speak you stop me, since you seem to fear that I shall speak, it is because you have nothing to tell me." Often in her fever, in her wanderings, her delirium, she had called her children, and she had clearly seen, for delirium takes note of things, that the old man did not reply to her.

The truth was that Tellmarch did not know what to say to her. It is not easy to tell a mother that her children are lost. And then, what did he know? nothing. He knew that a mother had been shot, that this mother had been found on the ground by himself, that when he had taken her up she was almost dead, that this dying mother had three children, and that the Marquis de Lantenac, after having had the mother shot, had carried off the little ones. All his information ended there. What had become of the children? Were they even living? He knew, because he had inquired, that there were two boys, and a little girl scarcely weaned. Nothing more. He asked himself a host of questions concerning this unfortunate family, but could answer none of them. The people of the neighborhood whom he had questioned contented themselves with shaking their heads. M. de Lantenac was a man of whom they did not willingly talk.

They did not willingly talk of de Lantenac, and they did not willingly talk to Tellmarch. Peasants have a kind of suspicion peculiar to themselves. They did not like Tellmarch. Tellmarch the Caimand was a puzzling man. Why was he always studying the sky? what was he doing and of what was he thinking in his long hours of immobility? Without a doubt, he was odd. In this land filled with war, with fire, and with rebellion, where all men had only one business, devastation, and one work, carnage, where whosoever could, burned a house, cut the throats of a family, massacred an outpost, sacked a village, where nobody thought of anything but laying ambushes for one another, drawing one another into snares, killing one another, this solitary being, absorbed in nature, as if submerged in the immense peacefulness of its beauties, gathering herbs and plants, occupied solely with the flowers, the birds, and the stars, was evidently dangerous. Plainly he was not in possession of his reason; he did not lie in wait behind thickets, he did not fire a shot at any one. Hence he created a certain dread about him.

"That man is mad," said the passers-by.

Tellmarch was more than isolated, he was shunned.

People asked him no questions and gave him few answers. So he had not been able to inform himself as he could have wished. The war had drifted elsewhere, the armies had gone to fight farther off, the Marquis de Lantenac had disappeared from the horizon, and in Tellmarch's state of mind, for him to be conscious that there was a war, it was necessary for it to set its foot upon him.

After those words, — "my children," — Tellmarch ceased to smile, and the woman went back to her thoughts. What was passing in that soul? It was as if she looked out from the depths of a gulf. Suddenly she turned toward Tellmarch, and cried again, almost with an accent of rage:

"My children!"

Tellmarch drooped his head like one guilty.

He was thinking of this Marquis de Lantenac who certainly was not thinking of him, and who, probably, no longer remembered that he existed. He accounted to himself for this, saying: "A lord, when he is in danger, knows you; when he is once out of it, he no longer knows you."

And he asked himself: "But why did I save this lord?"

And he answered his own question, "Because he was a man." After that he remained thoughtful for some time, then began again mentally:

"Am I very sure of that?"

And he repeated his bitter words: "If I had known!"

This whole adventure overwhelmed him; for in that which he had done he perceived a sort of enigma. He meditated sadly. A good action might then sometimes be an evil one. He who saves the wolf kills the sheep. He who sets the vulture's wing is responsible for his talons.

He felt himself truly guilty. The unreasoning anger of this mother was just.

Still, to have saved her consoled him for having saved the marquis.

But the children?

The mother also meditated. The thoughts of these two went on side by side, and, perhaps, though without speech, met one another amid the shadows of reverie.

The woman's eyes, with a night-like gloom in their depths, fixed themselves anew on Tellmarch.

"Nevertheless, that cannot be allowed to pass in this way," said she.

"Hush!" answered Tellmarch, laying his finger on his lips.

She continued: "You did wrong to save me, and I am angry with you for it. I would rather be dead, because I am sure I should see them then. I should know where they are.

They would not see me, but I should be near them. The dead, they ought to have power to protect."

He took her arm and felt her pulse.

"Calm yourself, you are bringing back your fever."

She asked him almost harshly:

"When can I go away from here?"

"Go away?"

"Yes. Walk."

"Never, if you do not be reasonable. To-morrow, if you are wise."

"What do you call being wise?"

"Having confidence in God."

"God! what has He done with my children?"

Her mind seemed wandering. Her voice became very sweet.

"You understand," said she to him, "I cannot rest like this. You have never had any children, but I have. That makes a difference. One cannot judge of a thing when one does not know what it is. You never had any children, had you?"

"No," replied Tellmarch.

"I—I had nothing besides them. Without my children, what am I? I should like to have somebody explain to me why I have not my children. I feel that things happen, but I do not understand. They killed my husband, they shot me, but all the same, I do not understand it."

"Come," said Tellmarch, "the fever is coming back to you. Do not talk any more."

She looked at him, and relapsed into silence.

From that day she spoke no more.

Tellmarch was obeyed more absolutely than he liked. She spent long hours of stupefaction, crouched at the foot of an old tree. She dreamed and held her peace. Silence makes an impenetrable refuge for simple souls that have been down into the blackest depths of suffering. She seemed to relinquish all effort to understand. To a certain extent despair is unintelligible to the despairing.

Tellmarch studied her with sympathetic interest. In the presence of this anguish the old man had thoughts such as might have come to a woman. "Oh, yes," said he to himself, "her lips do not speak, but her eyes talk; I know well what is the matter, what her one idea is. To have been a mother, and to be one no longer! to have been a nurse, and to be so no more! She cannot resign herself. She thinks about the smallest child of all, that she was nursing not long ago. She thinks of it, thinks, thinks. In truth, it must be so sweet to feel a little rosy mouth that draws your very soul out of your body, and who, with the life that is yours, makes a life for itself!"

He kept silence, comprehending the impotency of speech before an absorption like this. The persistence of an all-absorbing idea is terrible. And how to make a mother thus afflicted hear reason? Maternity is inexplicable; you cannot argue with it. That it is which renders a mother sublime, she becomes unreasoning. The maternal instinct is divinely animal. The mother is no longer a woman, she is a wild animal.

Her children are her young.

Hence in the mother there is something at once inferior and superior to argument. A mother has an unerring instinct. The immense mysterious Will of creation is within her and guides her. Blindness superhumanly enlightened.

Tellmarch now desired to make this unhappy creature speak; he did not succeed. On one occasion he said to her:

"As ill-luck will have it, I am old, and I cannot walk any longer. I reach the end of my strength before I reach the end of my journey. After a quarter of an hour, my legs give out, and I am obliged to rest; if it were not for that I would accompany you. After all, perhaps it is fortunate that I cannot. I should be rather dangerous than useful to you; I am tolerated here; but the Blues are suspicious of me as a peasant and the peasants suspect me of being a wizard."

He waited for her to reply. She did not even raise her eyes.

A fixed idea ends in madness or heroism. But of what heroism is a poor peasant woman capable? none. She can be a mother, and that is all. Each day she buried herself deeper in her reverie. Tellmarch watched her.

He tried to give her occupation; he brought her thread, needles and a thimble; and at last, to the satisfaction of the poor Caimand, she began some sewing, she dreamed, but she worked, a sign of health; her strength was returning little by little; she mended her linen, her garments, her shoes; but her eyes looked cold and glassy as ever. As she bent over her work, she sang strange melodies in a low voice. She murmured names, probably the names of children, but not distinctly enough for Tellmarch to catch them. She would stop suddenly and listen to the birds, as if she thought they might have tidings to bring to her. She watched the weather. Her lips would move. She was speaking to herself. She made a bag, and filled it with chestnuts. One morning Tellmarch saw her preparing to set out, her eyes gazing away into the depths of the forest.

"Where are you going?" asked he.

She replied:

"I am going to look for them."

He did not attempt to detain her.

VII.

THE TWO POLES OF THE TRUTH

At the end of a few weeks, which had been filled with the vicissitudes of civil war, the district of Fougères could talk of nothing but the two men who were opposed to each other, and yet were occupied in the same work, that is, fighting side by side the great revolutionary combat.

The savage Vendean duel continued, but the Vendée was losing ground. In Ille-et-Vilaine in particular, thanks to the young commander who, at Dol, had so opportunely replied to the audacity of six thousand Royalists by the audacity of fifteen hundred patriots, the insurrection, if not crushed, was at least greatly weakened and circumscribed. Several lucky hits had followed that one, and out of these successes had grown a new state of affairs.

Matters had changed their face, but a singular complication had arisen.

In all this part of the Vendée, the Republic had the upper hand, that was beyond a doubt; but which Republic? In the triumph which was opening out, two forms of republic made themselves felt, the republic of terror and the republic of clemency, the one desirous to conquer by harshness, and the other by mildness. Which would rule? These two forms, the conciliating and the implacable, were represented by two men, each of whom possessed his special influence and authority, the one a military commander, the other a civil delegate; which of them would prevail? One of the two, the delegate, had a formidable basis of support; he had arrived bearing the threatening watchword of the Paris Commune to the regiments of Santerre: "No mercy, no quarter!" He had, in order to put every thing under his control, the decree of the Convention, ordaining "death to whomsoever should set at liberty and help a captive rebel chief to escape," he had full powers, emanating from the Committee of Public Safety, and an injunction commanding obedience to him as delegate, signed: ROBESPIERRE, DANTON, MARAT. The other, the soldier, had on his side only this strength, pity.

He had only his own arm, which chastised the enemy, and his heart, which pardoned them. A conqueror, he believed that he had the right to spare the conquered.

Hence arose a conflict, hidden but deep, between these two men. The two stood in different atmospheres, both fighting the rebellion, and each having his own thunderbolt—that of the one, victory; that of the other, terror.

Throughout all the Bocage nothing was talked of but them; and, that which added to the anxiety of those who watched them from every quarter was the fact that these two men so diametrically opposed were at the same time closely united. These two antagonists were friends. Never sympathy loftier and more profound joined two hearts; the stern had saved the life of the merciful, and bore on his face the wound received in so doing. These two men were the incarnation, the one of death, the other of life; the one was the principle of destruction, the other the principle of peace, and they loved each other. A strange problem. Imagine Orestes merciful and Pylades pitiless. Picture Arimanes the brother of Ormus.

Let us add that the one of the pair called "the ferocious" was, at the same time, the most brotherly of men; he dressed the wounded, cared for the sick, passed his days and nights in the ambulance and hospitals, was touched by the sight of barefooted children, had nothing for himself, gave all to the poor. When there was fighting, he was there; he marched at the head of the columns and in the thickest of the fight, armed, for he had in his belt a sabre and two pistols, yet disarmed, because no one had ever seen him draw his sabre or touch his pistols. He faced blows and did not return them. It was said that he had been a priest.

One of these men was Gauvain, the other was Cimourdain.

There was friendship between the two men, but hatred between the two principles; it was like a soul cut in two and divided. Gauvain, in fact, had received part of the spirit of Cimourdain, but the gentle part. It seemed as if Gauvain had been given the white light and that Cimourdain had kept for himself that which might be called the black light. From this came discord. This hidden war could not fail to burst forth. One morning the battle began.

Cimourdain said to Gauvain:

"What have we accomplished?"

Gauvain replied:

"You know as well as I. I have dispersed Lantenac's bands. He has only a few men left. Then he is driven back to the forest of Fougères. In eight days, he will be surrounded."

"And in fifteen days?"

"He will be taken."

"And then?"

"You have read my notice?"

"Yes. Well?"

"He will be shot."

"More clemency. He must be guillotined."

"For my part," said Gauvain, "I am for a military death."

"And I," replied Cimourdain, "for a revolutionary death."

He looked Gauvain in the face, and added:

"Why did you set at liberty those nuns of the convent of Saint-Marc-le-Blanc?"

"I do not make war on women," answered Gauvain.

"Those women hate the people. And where hate is concerned, one woman outweighs ten men. Why did you refuse to send to the Revolutionary Tribunal all that herd of old fanatical priests who were taken at Louvigné?"

"I do not make war on old men."

"An old priest is worse than a young one. Rebellion is more dangerous preached by white hairs. Men have faith in wrinkles. No false pity, Gauvain. The regicides are liberators. Keep your eye fixed on the tower of the Temple."

"The tower of the Temple! I would bring the Dauphin out of it. I do not make war on children."

Cimourdain's eyes grew stern.

"Gauvain, learn that it is necessary to make war on a woman when she calls herself Marie Antoinette, on an old man when he is named Pius VI. and Pope, and upon a child when he is named Louis Capet."

"My master, I am not a politician."

"Try not to be a dangerous man. Why, at the attack on the post of Cossé, when the rebel Jean Treton, driven back and lost, flung himself alone, sabre in hand, against the whole column, didst thou cry: 'Open the ranks! Let him pass!'?"

"Because one does not set fifteen hundred to kill a single man."

"Why, at the Cailleterie d'Astillé, when you saw your soldiers about to kill the Vendean Joseph Bézier, who was wounded and dragging himself along, did you exclaim: 'Go on before! This is my affair!' and then fire your pistol in the air?"

"Because one does not kill a man on the ground."

"And you were wrong. Both are to-day chiefs of bands; Joseph Bézier is Moustache, and Jean Treton is Jambe d'Argent. In saving those two men you gave two enemies to the Republic."

"Certainly I could wish to give her friends, and not enemies."

"Why, after the victory of Landéan, did you not shoot your three hundred peasant prisoners?"

"Because, Bonchamp had shown mercy to the Republican prisoners, and I wanted it said that the Republic showed mercy to the Royalist prisoners."

"But, then, if you take Lantenac, you will pardon him?"

"No."

"Why? Since you showed mercy to the three hundred peasants."

"The peasants are ignorant men; Lantenac knows what he does."

"But Lantenac is your kinsman."

"France is the nearest."

"Lantenac is an old man."

"Lantenac is a stranger. Lantenac has no age. Lantenac summons the English. Lantenac is invasion. Lantenac is the enemy of the country. The duel between us can only finish by his death or mine."

"Gauvain, remember those words."

"It is sworn."

There was silence and the two looked at each other.

Then Gauvain said:

"It will be a bloody date, this year '93 in which we live."

"Take care!" cried Cimourdain. "Terrible duties exist. Do not accuse that which is not accusable. Since when is it that the illness is the fault of the physician? Yes, the characteristic of this tremendous year is its pitilessness. Why? because it is the grand revolutionary year. This year in which we live is the incarnation of the Revolution. The Revolution has an enemy, the old world, and it is without pity for it, just as the surgeon has an enemy, gangrene, and is without pity for it. The Revolution extirpates royalty in the king, aristocracy in the noble, despotism in the soldier, superstition in the priest, barbarism in the judge; in a word, everything which is tyranny, in all that which is the tyrant. The operation is fearful, the Revolution performs it with a sure hand. As to the amount of sound flesh which it sacrifices, ask Boerhave what he thinks in regard to that. What tumor does not cause a loss of blood in its cutting away? Does not the extinguishing of a conflagration demand an energy as fierce as that of the fire itself? These formidable necessities are the very conditions of success. A surgeon resembles a butcher; a healer may have the appearance of an executioner. The Revolution devotes itself to its fatal work. It mutilates, but it saves. What! You demand pity for the virus! you wish it to be merciful to that which is poisonous! It will not listen. It holds the past; it will exterminate it. It makes in civilization a deep wound, from which will spring health to the human race. You suffer? without doubt. How long will it last? the time necessary for the operation. After that you will live. The Revolution amputates the world. Hence this hemorrhage—'93."

"The surgeon is calm," said Gauvain, "and the men that I see are violent."

"The Revolution," replied Cimourdain, "needs savage workmen to aid it. It pushes aside every hand that trembles. It has faith only in the inexorables. Danton is the terrible, Robespierre is the inflexible, Saint-Just is the immovable, Marat is the implacable. Take care, Gauvain. Those names are necessary. They are worth as much as armies to us. They will terrify Europe."

"And perhaps also the future," said Gauvain.

He checked himself, and resumed:

"For that matter, my master, you are wrong, I accuse no one. According to me, the true point of view of the Revolution is its irresponsibility. Nobody is innocent, nobody is guilty. Louis XVI. is a sheep thrown among lions. He wishes to escape, he tries to flee, he seeks to defend himself; he would bite, if he could. But everyone cannot be a lion at will. His powerlessness passes for crime. This enraged sheep shows his teeth. 'The traitor!' cry the lions. And they eat him. That done, they fight among themselves."

"The sheep is a brute."

"And the lions, what are they?"

This retort set Cimourdain thinking. He raised his head, and answered:

"These lions are consciences. These lions are ideas. These lions are principles."

"They produce the reign of terror."

"Some day, the Revolution will be the justification of this terror."

"Beware lest the terror become the shame of the Revolution."

And Gauvain continued:

"Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, these are the dogmas of peace and harmony. Why give them an alarming aspect? What is it we want? To bring the peoples to a universal republic. Well, let us not make them afraid. What use can intimidation serve? The people can no more be attracted by a scarecrow than birds. One must not do evil to bring about good. One does not overturn the throne in order to leave the gibbet standing. Death to kings, and life to nations. Strike off the crowns, spare the heads. The Revolution is peace, not fear. Merciful ideas are ill served by cruel men. Peace is to me the most beautiful word in the human language. I will shed blood only in risking my own. Moreover, I simply know how to fight and I am nothing but a soldier. But if I may not pardon, victory is not worth what it costs. In battle let us be the enemies of our enemies, and after the victory their brothers."

"Take care!" repeated Cimourdain, for the third time. "Gauvain, you are more to me than a son, take care!"

Then he added thoughtfully:

"In such a time as this, pity may be one of the forms of treason."

Any one listening to these two men might have fancied that he heard a dialogue between the sword and the axe.

VIII.

DOLOROSA

In the meanwhile the mother was seeking her little ones.

She went straight forward. How did she live? It is impossible to say. She herself did not know. She walked day and night; she begged, she ate herbs, she lay on the ground, she slept in the open air, in the thickets, under the stars, sometimes in the rain and wind.

She wandered from village to village, from farm to farm, seeking a clew. She stopped on the thresholds of the peasants' cots. Her dress was in rags. Sometimes she was welcomed, sometimes she was driven away. When she could not get into the houses, she went into the woods.

She did not know the country, she was ignorant of everything, except Siscoignard and the parish of Azé; she had no route marked out, she retraced her steps, traveled roads already gone over, made useless journeys. Sometimes she followed the highway, sometimes a cart-track, sometimes the paths among the copses. In these aimless wanderings she had worn out her miserable garments. She had shoes at first, then she walked barefoot, then with her feet bleeding.

She crossed the track of warfare, among gunshots, hearing nothing, seeing nothing, avoiding nothing, seeking her children. Revolt was everywhere, there were no gendarmes, no mayors, no authorities of any sort. She had only to deal with chance passers.

She spoke to them. She asked:

"Have you seen three little children any where?"

Those she addressed would look at her.

"Two boys and a girl," she would say.

Then she would name them:

"René-Jean, Gros-Alain, Georgette. You have not seen them?"

She would ramble on thus:

"The eldest is four years and a half old; the little girl is twenty months."

Then would come the cry:

"Do you know where they are? they have taken them from me."

The listeners would stare at her and that was all.

When she saw that she was not understood, she would say:

"It is because they belong to me. That is why."

The people would pass on their way. Then she would stand still, uttering no further word, but digging at her breast with her nails.

However, one day, a peasant listened to her. The good man set himself to thinking.

"Wait, now," said he. "Three children?"

"Yes."

"Two boys . . . ?"

"And a girl."

"You are hunting for them?"

"Yes."

"I have heard talk of a lord who had taken three little children and had them with him."

"Where is this man?" cried she. "Where are they?"

The peasant replied:

"Go to La Tourgue."

"Shall I find my children there?"

"It may easily be."

"You say . . . ?"

"La Tourgue."

"What is that—La Tourgue?"

"It is a place."

"Is it a village? a castle? a farm?"

"I never was there."

"Is it far?"

"It is not near."

"In which direction?"

"Toward Fougères."

"Which way must I go?"

"You are at Vantortes," said the peasant; "you must leave Ernée to the left and Coxelles to the right, you will pass by Lorchamp and cross the Leroux."

And the peasant pointed his finger to the west.

"Always straight before you and toward the sunset."

Ere the peasant had dropped his arm, she was hurrying on.

The peasant cried after her:

"But take care. They are fighting over there."

She did not answer or turn round, on she went, straight before her.

IX.

A PROVINCIAL BASTILE

I.

LA TOURGUE

Forty years ago, the traveler who entered the forest of Fougères from the side of Laignelet, and left it toward Parigné, was met, on the border of this vast old wood by a sinister spectacle. As he came out of the thickets, La Tourgue rose abruptly before him.

Not La Tourgue living, but La Tourgue dead. La Tourgue cracked, battered, seamed, dismantled. A ruin is to a building what a ghost is to a man. No more mournful vision could strike the gaze than that of La Tourgue. What the traveler had before his eyes was a lofty round tower, standing alone at the corner of the wood like a malefactor. This tower, rising from a perpendicular rock, was so severe and solid that it looked almost like a bit of Roman architecture, and the immense mass gave the idea of strength even amid its ruin. It was Roman in a way, for it dated from the age of romance. Begun in the ninth century, it had been finished in the twelfth, after the third Crusade. The peculiar ornamentation of the openings in the wall told its age. On ascending the height, one perceived a breach in the wall, if one ventured to enter, one found oneself within the tower—it was empty. It resembled somewhat the inside of a stone trumpet set upright on the ground. From top to bottom no partitions; no ceilings, no floors, there were places where arches and chimneys had been torn away, falconet embrasures were seen, at different heights, rows of granite corbels and a few transverse beams marked where the different stories had been; these beams were covered with the ordure of night birds; the colossal wall was fifteen feet in thickness at the base and twelve at the summit; here and there were chinks and holes which had been doors, through which one caught glimpses of staircases in the shadowy interior of the wall. The passer-by who went there at evening heard the cry of the wood-owl and the Brittany heron, and saw beneath his feet brambles, stones, reptiles, and above his head, through a black circle which looked like the mouth of an enormous well, he could perceive the stars.

The neighborhood kept a tradition that in the upper stories of this tower there were secret doors formed like those in the tombs of the kings of Juda, of one large stone turning on a pivot, opening, then closing, and forming part of the wall; an architectural fashion which the Crusaders had brought from the East along with the pointed arch. When these doors were shut, it was impossible to discover them, so accurately were they fitted into the other stones. At this day such doors may still be seen in those mysterious Lybian cities which escaped the burial of the twelve towns in the time of Tiberius.

II.

THE BREACH

The breach by which one entered the ruin was the opening made by the explosion of a mine. For a connoisseur, familiar with Errard, Sardi, and Pagan, this mine had been skillfully planned. The fire-chamber, shaped like a mitre, was proportioned to the strength of the keep it had been intended to disembowel. It must have held at least two hundredweight of powder. The channel was winding, which does better service than a straight one; the crumbling of the mine brought to light among the broken stones the saucisse which had the requisite diameter, that of a hen's egg. The explosion made a large breach in the wall by which the besiegers could enter. This tower had evidently sustained at different periods real sieges conducted according to rule; it was scarred with balls; and these balls were not all of the same epoch. Each projectile has its peculiar way of marking a rampart, and projectiles of every sort had left their traces on this keep, from the stone balls of the fourteenth century to the iron ones of the eighteenth.

The breach gave admittance into what must have been the ground-floor. Opposite the breach in the wall of the tower there opened the gateway of a crypt cut in the rock and stretching among the foundations of the tower as far as the ground-floor hall.

This crypt, three-fourths filled up, was cleared out in 1835, under the direction of M. Auguste Le Prévost, the antiquary of Bernay.

III.

THE OUBLIETTE

This crypt was the oubliette. Every keep had one. This crypt, like many penal prisons of that era, had two stories. The upper floor, which was entered by the gateway, was a vaulted chamber of considerable size, on a level with the ground-floor hall. On the walls of this chamber could be seen two parallel and vertical furrows, extending from one side to the other, and passing along the vault of the roof, in which they had left deep ruts like old wheel-tracks. In fact it was what they were. These two furrows had been hollowed by two wheels. Formerly, in feudal days, victims were torn limb from limb in this chamber by a method less noisy than dragging them at the tails of horses. There had been two wheels so immense that they touched the walls and the arch. To each of these wheels an arm and a leg of the victim were attached, then the wheels were turned in opposite directions, which tore the man apart. It required great force; hence the furrows which the wheels had worn in the wall as they grazed it. A chamber of this kind may still be seen at Vianden.

Below this room there was another. That was the real oubliette. It was not entered by a door, one reached it by means of a hole. The victim, stripped naked, was let down by means of a rope placed under his arm-pits, into the dungeon, through an opening left in the centre of the flagging of the upper chamber. If he persisted in living, food was flung to him through this opening. A hole of this sort may yet be seen at Bouillon.

The wind swept through this opening. The lower room, dug out beneath the ground-floor hall, was a well rather than a chamber. It had water at the bottom, and an icy wind filled it. This wind, which killed the prisoner below, preserved the life of the captive in the room above. It rendered the air in his prison respirable. The captive above, groping about beneath his vault, received only air by this hole. Moreover, whatever entered or fell there could not get out again. It behooved the prisoner to be cautious in the darkness. A false step might make the prisoner in the upper room a prisoner in the dungeon below. That was his affair. If he clung to life, this hole was a peril; if he were tired of it, this hole was his resource. The upper floor was the dungeon, the lower was the tomb. A superposition which resembled society at that period.

It was what our ancestors called a "moat-dungeon." The thing having disappeared, the name has no longer any significance in our ears. Thanks to the Revolution, we hear the words pronounced with indifference.

Outside the tower, above the breach, which forty years ago was the only means of ingress, might be seen an opening larger than the other loop-hole, from which hung an iron grating bent and loosened.

IV.

THE BRIDGE-CASTLE

On the opposite side from the breach a stone bridge was connected with the tower, having still three arches in almost perfect preservation. This bridge had supported a building of which some fragments remained. It had evidently been destroyed by fire, there were left only portions of the framework, between whose blackened ribs the daylight peeped, as it rose beside the tower like a skeleton beside a phantom.

This ruin is to-day completely demolished, not a trace of it is left. It needs only one day and a single peasant to destroy that which it took many centuries and many kings to build.

La Tourgue, a rustic abbreviation, stands for La Tour-Gauvain (the Tower of Gauvain), just as La Jupelle stands for La Jupellière, and that the nickname of a hunchbacked leader, Pinson-le-Tort, is put for Pinson-le-Tortu.

La Tourgue, which forty years ago was a ruin, and which is to-day a shadow, was a fortress in 1793. It was the old bastile of the Gauvains, guarding toward the west the entrance to the forest of Fougères, a forest which is itself now hardly a grove.

This citadel had been built on one of the great blocks of slate which are quite numerous between Mayenne and Dinan, and scattered everywhere among the thickets and heaths like missiles that had been flung in some conflict between titans.

The tower made up the entire fortress; beneath the tower was the rock, at the foot of the rock one of those water-courses which the month of January turns into a torrent and which the month of June dries up.

Thus protected, this fortress was in the Middle Ages almost impregnable. The bridge weakened it. The Gothic Gauvains had built without a bridge. They got into it by one of those swinging foot-bridges which a blow of an axe sufficed to break away. As long as the Gauvains remained vicomtes it sufficed for their needs, and they contented themselves with it, but when they became marquises, and left the cavern for the court, they flung three arches across the torrent, and made themselves accessible on the side of the plain just as they had made themselves accessible to the king. The marquis of the seventeenth century, and the marquise of the eighteenth, no longer wished to be impregnable. An imitation of Versailles replaced the traditions of their ancestors.

Facing the tower, on the western side, there was a high plateau which ended in the plain; this plateau almost touched the tower, and was separated from it only by a very deep ravine through which ran the watercourse which was a tributary of the Couesnon. The bridge, which joined the fortress and the plateau, was built up high on piers; and on these piers was constructed, as at Chenonceaux, an edifice in the Mansard style, more habitable than the tower. But the customs were still very rude; the lords continued to occupy chambers in the keep which were like dungeons. The building on the bridge, which was a sort of small castle, was made into a long corridor that served as an entrance and was called the hall of the guards; above this hall of the guards, which was a kind of entresol, a library was built, above the library was a granary. Long windows with small panes of Bohemian glass, pilasters between the casements, medallions sculptured on the wall; three stories; below, partisans and muskets; in the middle, books; on high, sacks of oats; the whole at once somewhat savage and very princely.

The tower rose stern and gloomy at the side. It overlooked this coquettish building with all its haughty pride. From its platform one could destroy the bridge.

The two edifices, the one rude, the other elegant, clashed rather than contrasted. The two styles had nothing in keeping with one another; although it would seem that two semicircles ought to be identical, nothing can be less alike than a full Roman arch and the classic archivolt. That tower, in keeping with the forests, made a strange neighbor for that bridge, worthy of Versailles. Imagine Alain Barbe-Torte giving his arm to Louis XIV. The juxtaposition was sinister. These two majesties thus mingled made up a whole which had in it something inexpressibly menacing.

From a military point of view, the bridge, we must insist upon this, was a traitor to the tower. It embellished, but disarmed; in gaining ornament the fortress had lost strength. The bridge put it on a level with the plateau. Still impregnable on the side toward the forest, it became vulnerable toward the plain. Formerly it commanded the plateau; now it was commanded thereby. An enemy installed there would speedily become master of the bridge. The library and the granary would be for the besieger and against the citadel.

A library and a granary resemble each other in the fact that both books and straw are combustible. For an assailant who serves himself by fire, to burn Homer or to burn a bundle of straw, provided it make a flame, is all the same. The French proved this to the Germans by burning the library at Heidelberg, and the Germans proved it to the French by burning the library of Strasbourg. This bridge, built on to La Tourgue, was therefore, strategically, an error; but in the seventeenth century, under Colbert and Louvois, the Gauvain princes no more considered themselves likely to be besieged than did the princes of Rohan or the princes of La Trémoille. Still the builders of the bridge had taken some precautions. In the first place they had foreseen the possibility of conflagration; below the three casements that looked down the stream they had fastened transversely to cramp-irons, which could still be seen half a century back, a strong ladder, whose length equaled the height of the two first stories of the bridge, a height which surpassed that of three ordinary stories; secondly, they had cut off the bridge from the tower by means of a low, heavy iron door; this door was arched; it was locked by a great key, which was hidden in a place known to the lord alone, and, once closed, this door could defy a battering-ram and almost brave a cannon-ball.

It was necessary to cross the bridge in order to reach this door, and to pass through the door in order to enter the tower. There was no other entrance.

V.

THE IRON DOOR

The second story of the small castle on the bridge, being raised by the arches, corresponded with the second story of the tower; it was at this height, for greater security, that the iron door had been placed.

The iron door opened toward the library on the bridge side and toward a grand vaulted hall with a pillow in the centre, on the side to the tower. This hall, as has already been said, was the second story of the keep. It was circular, like the tower; long loop-holes, looking out on the fields, lighted it. The rude wall was naked, and nothing hid the stones, which were, however, symmetrically laid. This hall was reached by a winding staircase built in the wall, a very simple thing when the walls are fifteen feet in thickness. In the Middle Ages a town had to be taken street by street, a street house by house, a house room by room. A fortress was besieged story by story. In this respect La Tourgue was very skillfully arranged and was very intricate and difficult. A spiral staircase, at first very steep, led from one floor to the other, the doors were sloping and were not of the height of a man, and to pass through it was necessary to bow the head; now, a head bowed was a head cut off; and, at each door, the besieged awaited the besiegers.

Below the circular hall with the pillar were two similar chambers, which made the first and the ground floor, and above were three; over these six chambers, placed one upon another, the tower was closed by a lid of stone which was the platform, and which could only be reached by a narrow watch-tower.

The fifteen-feet thickness of wall which it had been necessary to pierce in order to place the iron door, and in the middle of which it was set, imbedded it in a long arch; so that the door when closed was, both on the side toward the bridge and the side toward the tower, under a porch six or seven feet deep; when it was open, these two porches joined and made the entrance-arch.

In the thickness of the wall of the porch toward the bridge opened a low gate leading to a Saint-Gilles' stairway, which led into the corridor of the first story beneath the library; this offered another difficulty to besiegers. The small castle of the bridge showed, on the side toward the plateau, only a perpendicular wall, and the bridge ended there. A drawbridge, which drew up to cover a low door, put it in communication with the plateau, and this drawbridge, which, on account of the height of the plateau, was never lowered except at an incline, allowed access to the long corridor called the guard-room. Once masters of this corridor, the besiegers, in order to reach the iron door, would have been obliged to carry by main force the winding staircase which led to the second story.

VI.

THE LIBRARY

As for the library, it was an oblong room, the width and length of the bridge, with a single door, the iron one. A false swinging door, hung with green cloth, which it was only necessary to push, masked in the interior the entrance-arch of the tower. The library wall from floor to ceiling was covered with book-cases with glass doors, in the beautiful style of the seventeenth-century cabinet-work. Six large windows, three on either side, one above each arch, lighted this library. Through these windows, from the outside and from the top of the plateau, the interior could be seen. In the spaces between these windows stood six marble busts on pedestals of sculptured oak, Hermolaüs of Byzantium, Athenæus the ancient grammarian, Suidas, Casaubon, Clovis, King of France, and his chancellor, Anachalus, who, for that matter, was no more chancellor than Clovis was king.

There were books of various sorts in this library. One has remained famous. It was an old folio with prints, having as a title: "SAINT BARTHOLOMEW," in large letters, and as a sub-title: "The Gospel according to Saint Bartholomew, preceded by a dissertation by Pantœnus, Christian philosopher, as to whether this gospel ought to be considered apocryphal, and whether Saint Bartholomew was the same as Nathanael." This book, considered a unique copy, was placed on a reading-desk in the middle of the library. In the last century, people came to see it as a curiosity.

VII.

THE GRANARY

The granary, which took, like the library, the oblong form of the bridge, was simply that space beneath the woodwork of the roof. It was a great room filled with straw and hay, and lighted by six mansard windows. There was no ornament, except a figure of Saint Barnabas carved on the door, with this line beneath:

"Barnabas sanctus falcem jubet ire per herbam."

A large, lofty tower, of six stories, pierced here and there with loop-holes, having for entrance and egress a single door of iron leading to a bridge-castle, shut off by a draw-bridge; behind the tower, a forest; in front of the tower, a plateau of heath, higher than the bridge, lower than the tower; beneath the bridge, a deep, narrow ravine full of brush-wood, a torrent in winter, a brook in springtime, a stony moat in summer, such was the Gauvain castle, called La Tourgue.

X.

THE HOSTAGES

July had gone, August came, a blast, fierce and heroic, swept over France, two spectres had just passed beyond the horizon, Marat with a dagger in his heart, Charlotte Corday a headless corpse, the situation everywhere was becoming terrible. As for the Vendée, beaten in her grand strategic schemes, she took refuge in little ones, more formidable, as we have already said; this war was now an immense fight scattered about among the woods; the disasters to the large army, called the Catholic and Royal, had commenced; the army of Mayence had been ordered into the Vendée; eight thousand Vendeans had fallen at Ancenis; the Vendeans had been driven out of Nantes, dislodged from Montaigu, expelled from Thouars, chased from Noirmoutier, flung headlong out of Cholet, Mortagne, and Saumur; they had evacuated Parthenay; they had abandoned Clisson; fallen back from Châtillon; lost a flag at Saint-Hilaire; had been beaten at Pornic, at the Sables, at Fontenay, Doué, at the Château d'Eau, at the Ponts-de-Cé; they were kept in check at Luçon, were retreating from the Châtaigneraye, and routed at the Roche-sur-Yon; but, on the one hand they were threatening Rochelle, and on the other an English fleet in the Guernsey waters, commanded by General Craig, and bearing several English regiments and some of the best officers of the French navy, only waited a signal from the Marquis de Lantenac to land. This landing might make the royalist revolt again victorious. Pitt was in truth a state malefactor; in politics there are treasons, even as in an outfit of arms there is the dagger. Pitt stabbed our country and betrayed his own; to dishonor his country was to betray it; under him and through him England waged a Punic war. She spied, she cheated, she lied. A poacher and a forger, she stopped at nothing; she descended to the very minutiæ of hatred. She monopolized tallow, which cost five francs a pound; an Englishman was taken at Lille on whom was found a letter from Prigent, Pitt's agent in the Vendée, which contained these lines: "I beg you to spare no money. We hope that the assassinations will be committed with prudence. Disguised priests and women are the persons most fit for this duty. Send sixty thousand francs to Rouen and fifty thousand to Caen." This letter was read in the Convention on the first of August by Barère. The cruelties of Parrein, and later, the atrocities of Carrier, replied to these perfidies. The Republicans of Metz and the Republicans of the South were eager to march against the rebels. A decree ordered the formation of eighty companies of pioneers for burning the copses and thickets of the Bocage. It was an unheard-of crisis. The war ceased at one place only to begin at another. "No mercy! no prisoners!" was the cry of both parties. The history of that time is black with awful shadows.

During this month of August, La Tourgue was besieged.

One evening, just as the stars were rising, amid the calm twilight of the dog-days, when not a leaf stirred in the forest, not a blade of grass trembled on the plain, across the stillness of the night, swept the sound of a horn. This horn was blown from the top of the tower.

The peal was answered by the voice of a trumpet from below.

On the summit of the tower stood an armed man; at the foot, a camp spread out in the shadow.

In the darkness around Gauvain castle could be distinguished a moving mass of black shapes. This mass was a bivouac. A few fires began to blaze beneath the trees in the forest and among the bushes on the plateau, pricking the darkness here and there with luminous points, as if the earth were studding itself with stars at the same time as the sky. The terrible stars of war! On the side toward the plateau, the bivouac stretched out to the plains and on the forest side extended into the thicket. La Tourgue was besieged.

The outstretch of the besiegers' camp indicated a numerous force. The camp tightly clasped the fortress, coming close up to the rock on the side toward the tower and close to the ravine on the bridge side.

There was a second sound of the horn, followed by another peal from the trumpet.

This time the horn questioned and the trumpet replied.

This horn was the question of the tower to the camp: "Can we speak to you?" and the question was the answer from the camp: "Yes."

At this period, the Vendeans were not considered as belligerents by the Convention, and a decree having forbidden the exchange of flags of truce with "the brigands," the armies supplemented as they could the means of communication which the law of nations authorizes in ordinary war and forbids in civil strife.

Hence, on occasion, a certain understanding between the peasant's horn and the military trumpet. The first call was only to attract attention; the second put the question: "Will you listen?" If, on this second summons, the trumpet kept silent, it was a refusal; if the trumpet replied, it was a consent. It signified: "Truce for a few moments."

The trumpet having answered this second appeal, the man on the top of the tower spoke, and these words could be heard:

"Men who listen to me, I am Gouge-le-Bruant, surnamed Brise-Bleu (Crush-the-Blues), because I have exterminated many of you, also surnamed Imânus, because I mean to kill still more than I have already killed. My finger was cut off by a blow from a sabre on the barrel of my gun in the attack at Granville, at Laval you guillotined my father, my mother, and my sister Jacqueline, aged eighteen. This is who I am.

"I speak to you in the name of Monseigneur le Marquis Gauvain de Lantenac, Vicomte de Fontenay, Prince of Brittany, Lord of the Seven Forests, my master.

"Learn first that Monseigneur le Marquis, before shutting himself in this tower where you hold him besieged, distributed the command among six chiefs, his lieutenants; he gave to Delière the district between the road to Brest and the road to Ernée; to Tréton, the district between Roë and Laval; to Jacquet, called Taillefer, the border of the Haut-Maine; to Gaulier, named Grand-Pierre, Château Gonthier; to Lecomte, Craon; Fougères, to Monsieur Dubois-Guy; and all Mayenne to Monsieur de Rochambeau; so, the taking of this fortress will not end matters for you, and, even if Monseigneur the Marquis should die, the Vendée of God and the King will not die.

"What I tell you, you understand, is to warn you. Monseigneur is here, by my side. I am the mouth through which his words pass. You who are besieging us, keep silence.

"This is what it is important for you to hear:

"Do not forget that the war you are making against us is without justice. We are men inhabiting our own country, and we fight honestly, and we are as simple and pure beneath the will of God as the grass is beneath the dew. It is the Republic who has attacked us; she comes to trouble us in our fields, she has burned our houses, ruined our harvests and our farms, and our women and children were forced to wander with naked feet among the woods while the winter robin was still singing.

"You who are down there and who hear me, you have inclosed us in the forest, and surrounded us in this tower; you have killed or put to flight those who joined us; you have cannon; you have added to your troop the garrisons and posts of Mortain, of Barenton, of Teilleul, of Landivy, of Évran, of Tinténiac, and of Vitré, by which means you are four thousand five hundred soldiers who attack us; and we, we are nineteen men who defend ourselves.

"We have provisions and munitions.

"You have succeeded in mining and blowing up a corner of our rock and a bit of our wall.

"That has made a gap at the foot of the tower, and this gap is a breach by which you can enter, although it is not open to the sky, and the tower, still upright and strong, makes an arch above it.

"Now you are preparing the assault.

"And we, first, Monseigneur le Marquis, who is Prince of Brittany and secular prior of the Abbey of Sainte-Marie de Lantenac, where a daily mass was established by Queen Jeanne, and, after him, the other defenders of the tower, who are, Monsieur the Abbé Turmeau, whose military name is Grand-Francœur, my comrade, Guinoiseau, who is captain of Camp Vert; my comrade,

Chante-en-hiver, who is captain of Camp Avoine, my comrade, Musette, who is captain of the Camp des Fourmis, and I, a peasant, born in the town of Daon, through which runs the brook Moriandre, we all, all have one thing to say to you.

"Men who are at the foot of this tower, listen.

"We have in our hands three prisoners, three children. These children were adopted by one of your regiments, and they belong to you. We offer to surrender these three children to you.

"On one condition.

"It is that we shall depart freely.

"If you refuse, listen well, you can attack us only in two ways, by the breach, on the side of the forest, or by the bridge, on the side of the plateau. The building on the bridge has three stories; in the lower story, I Imânus, I, who speak to you, have put six hogsheads of tar and a hundred bundles of dried heath; in the top story there is straw; in the middle story there are books and papers; the iron door which communicates between the bridge and the tower is closed, and Monseigneur carries the key; I myself have made a hole under the door, and through this hole passes a sulphur slow match, one end of which is in the tar and the other within reach of my hand, inside the tower; I can fire it when I choose. If you refuse to let us go out, the three children will be placed in the second floor of the bridge, between the story where the sulphur-match touches the tar and the floor where the straw is, and the iron door will be shut on them. If you attack by the bridge, it will be you who set the building on fire; if you attack by the breach and the bridge at the same time, the fire will be kindled at the same instant by us both; and, in any case, the three children will perish.

"Now, accept or refuse.

"If you accept, we come out.

"If you refuse, the children die.

"I have spoken."

The man speaking from the top of the tower became silent.

A voice from below cried:

"We refuse."

This voice was harsh and severe. Another voice, less harsh, though firm, added:

"We give you twenty-four hours to surrender at discretion."

There was a silence, then the same voice continued:

"To-morrow, at this hour, if you have not surrendered, we commence the assault."

And the first voice resumed:

"And then no quarter."

To this savage voice another replied from the top of the tower. Between the two battlements a lofty figure bent forward, and in the starlight, the stern face of the Marquis de Lantenac could be distinguished, and this figure, whose glance shot down into the obscurity and seemed to seek for some one, cried:

"So, it is thou, priest!"

"Yes, it is I, traitor!" replied the stern voice from below.

XI.

TERRIBLE AS THE ANTIQUE

The stern voice was, in truth, that of Cimourdain; the younger and less imperative that of Gauvain.

The Marquis de Lantenac did not deceive himself in fancying that he recognized Cimourdain.

As we know, a few weeks in this district, made bloody by civil war, had rendered Cimourdain famous; there was no notoriety more darkly sinister than his; people said: Marat at Paris, Châlier at Lyons, Cimourdain in the Vendée. They stripped the Abbé Cimourdain of all the respect which he had formerly commanded; that is the consequence of a priest's unfrocking himself. Cimourdain inspired horror. The severe are unfortunate; those who note their acts condemn them, though perhaps if their consciences could be seen they would stand absolved. A Lycurgus misunderstood appears a Tiberius. Whatever they may have been, those two men, the Marquis de Lantenac and the Abbé Cimourdain, were equally poised in the balance of hatred; the maledictions of the Royalists against Cimourdain made a counterpoise to the execrations of the Republicans against Lantenac. Each of these men, in the eyes of the opposing force, was a monster; so far did this resemblance go, that while Prieur de la Marne at Granville set a price on the head of Lantenac, Charette at Noirmoutiers set a price on the head of Cimourdain.

Let us add, these two men, the marquis and the priest, were up to a certain point the same man. The bronze mask of civil war has two profiles, the one turned toward the past, the other set toward the future, but both equally tragic, Lantenac was the first of these profiles, Cimourdain was the second: only the bitter sneer of Lantenac was full of darkness and of night, and on the fatal brow of Cimourdain shone the light of dawn.

And now the besieged of La Tourgue had a respite.

Thanks to the intervention of Gauvain, a sort of truce for twenty-four hours had been agreed upon.

Imânus had, indeed, been well informed, and, through the requisitions of Cimourdain, Gauvain had now four thousand five hundred men under his command, as many national guards as troops of the line, with these he had surrounded Lantenac in La Tourgue, and was able to level twelve cannon at the fortress, a masked battery of six pieces on the edge of the forest toward the tower, and an open battery of six on the plateau, toward the bridge. He had succeeded in springing the mine and making a breach at the foot of the tower.

Thus, when the twenty-four hours' truce was ended, the attack would begin under these conditions:

On the plateau and in the forest were four thousand five hundred men.

In the tower, nineteen.

History might find the names of those besieged nineteen in the list of outlaws. We shall perhaps meet them.

As commander of these four thousand five hundred men, which almost made an army, Cimourdain had wished Gauvain to allow himself to be made adjutant-general. Gauvain had refused, saying: "When Lantenac is taken, we will see. As yet, I have merited nothing."

Those great commands, with low regimental rank, were, for that matter, a custom among the Republicans. Bonaparte was, after this, at the same time colonel of artillery and general-in-chief of the army of Italy.

The Gauvain castle had a strange destiny; a Gauvain attacked it, a Gauvain defended it. From that fact rose a certain mildness in the attack, but not in the defense, for M. de Lantenac was a man who spared nothing, and moreover, he had always lived at Versailles and had no personal associations with La Tourgue, which he indeed scarcely knew. He had sought refuge there, because he had no other asylum, that was all; but he would have demolished it without scruple. Gauvain had more respect for the place.

The weak point of the fortress was the bridge; but in the library, which was on the bridge, were the family archives; if the assault was made on that side, the burning of the bridge would be inevitable; to burn the archives seemed to Gauvain like attacking his forefathers. La Tourgue was the ancestral dwelling of the Gauvains; in this tower centred all their fiefs of Brittany, just as all the fiefs of France centred in the tower of the Louvre; the home associations of Gauvain were there; he had been born within those walls; the strange fatalities of life forced him, a man, to attack this venerable pile which had sheltered him when a child. Could he be guilty of the impiety of reducing this dwelling to ashes? Perhaps his own cradle was stored in some corner of the granary above the library. Some reflections are emotions. Gauvain felt himself moved in the presence of this ancient house of his family. That was why he had spared the bridge. He had confined himself to making any sally or escape impossible by this outlet and had guarded the bridge by a battery, and he had chosen the opposite side for the attack. Hence the mining and sapping at the foot of the tower.

Cimourdain had allowed him to have his own way; he reproached himself, for his stern spirit revolted against all these Gothic relics, and he no more believed in pity for buildings than for men. Sparing a castle was a beginning of clemency. Now clemency was Gauvain's weak point; Cimourdain, as we have seen, watched him, drew him back from this, in his eyes, fatal weakness. Still he himself, though he felt a sort of rage in being forced to admit it to his soul, had not again seen La Tourgue without a secret shock; he felt himself softened at the sight of that study where were still the first books he had made Gauvain read; he had been the priest of the neighboring village, Parigné; he, Cimourdain, had dwelt in the attic of the bridge-castle; it was in the library that he had held Gauvain between his knees as a child and taught him to say the alphabet; it was within those four old walls that he had seen this well-beloved pupil, the son of his soul, grow in body and in mind. This library, this small castle, these walls full of his blessings upon the child, was he about to overturn and burn them? He had shown them mercy. Not without remorse.

He had allowed Gauvain to open the siege from the opposite point. La Tourgue had its savage side, the tower, and its civilized side, the library. Cimourdain had allowed Gauvain to make a breach in the savage side alone.

In truth, attacked by a Gauvain, defended by a Gauvain, this old dwelling returned, in the midst of the French Revolution, to feudal customs. Wars between kinsmen make up the history of the Middle Ages: the Eteocles and Polynices are Gothic as well as Grecian, and Hamlet does at Elsinore what Orestes did in Argos.

XII.

POSSIBLE ESCAPE

The whole night was consumed in preparations on both sides.

As soon as the sombre parley which we have just heard had ended, Gauvain's first act was to call his lieutenant.

Guéchamp, of whom it will be necessary to know somewhat, was a man of secondary order, honest, brave, with few ideas, a better soldier than a leader, rigorously intelligent up to the point where it becomes a duty not to understand, never softened, inaccessible to corruption of any sort, whether of venality which corrupts the conscience, or of pity which corrupts justice. He had on soul and heart those two shades, discipline and the countersign, as a horse has blinkers on both eyes, and he walked unflinchingly in the space thus left visible to him. His way was narrow, but his steps were straight.

Moreover, a man to be depended on ; severe in command, exact in obedience.

Gauvain spoke rapidly to Guéchamp.

"Guéchamp, a ladder."

"Commandant, we have none."

"One must be had."

"For scaling?"

"No; for saving."

Guéchamp reflected an instant, then answered:

"I understand. But for what you want it must be very high."

"At least three stories."

"Yes, commandant, that is pretty nearly the height."

"It must even go beyond that, for we must be certain of success."

"Without doubt."

"How does it happen that you have no ladder?"

"Commandant, you did not think best to besiege La Tourgue by the plateau; you contented yourself with blockading it on this side; you wished to attack, not by the bridge, but by the tower. So we only busied ourselves with the mine, and the plan was given up. That is why we have no ladders."

"Have one made immediately."

"A ladder three stories high cannot be easily made."

"Have several short ladders joined together."

"One must have them in order to do that."

"Find them."

"There are none to be found. All through the country the peasants destroy the ladders, just as they break up the carts and cut the bridges."

"It is true, they try to paralyze the Republic."

"They want to manage so that we can neither transport baggage, cross a river, nor scale a wall."

"Still, I must have a ladder."

"I just remember, commandant, at Javené, near Fougères, there is a large carpenter's shop. They might have one there."

"There is not a minute to lose."

"When do you want the ladder?"

"To-morrow at this hour, at the latest."

"I will send a messenger full speed to Javené. He can carry a requisition order. There is a post of cavalry at Javené which will furnish an escort. The ladder can be here to-morrow before sunset."

"It is well, that will answer," said Gauvain; "act quickly. Go."

Ten minutes later Guéchamp came back and said to Gauvain, "Commandant, the messenger has started for Javené."

Gauvain ascended the plateau and remained for a long time with his eyes fixed on the bridge-castle across the ravine. The gable of the building, without other means of access than the low entrance closed by the raising of the drawbridge, faced the steep side of the ravine. In order to reach the arches of the bridge from the plateau, it was necessary to descend, a feat it was possible to accomplish by clinging to the brushwood. But once in the moat, the assailants would be exposed to all the projectiles that might rain from the three stories. Gauvain ended by convincing himself that, at the point which the siege had reached, the main attack ought to be by the breach of the tower.

He took every measure to render any escape out of the question; he increased the number of sentries; he drew closer the ranks of his battalions so that nothing could pass between. Gauvain and Cimourdain divided the siege of the fortress between them; Gauvain reserved the forest side for himself and gave Cimourdain the side toward the plateau. It was agreed that, while Gauvain, seconded by Guéchamp, led the assault through the mine, Cimourdain should guard the bridge and ravine with every match of the open battery lighted.

XIII.

WHAT THE MARQUIS DID

While without every preparation for the attack was being made, within everything was preparing for resistance.

It is not without a real analogy that a tower is called a cask, and sometimes a tower is breached by a mine as a cask is bored by an auger. The wall opens like a bung-hole. This was what had happened at La Tourgue.

The great blast of two or three hundred-weight of powder had burst the mighty wall through and through. This breach started from the foot of the tower, cut through the wall in its thickest part, and made a sort of shapeless arch in the ground-floor of the fortress. On the outside the besiegers, in order to render this gap practicable for the assault, had enlarged and finished it off by cannon-shots.

The ground-floor which this breach penetrated was a great round hall, entirely empty, with a central pillar which supported the key-stone of the vaulted roof. This chamber, the largest in the whole keep, was not less than forty feet in diameter. Each story of the tower was composed of a similar room, but smaller, with guards to the embrasures of the loop-holes. The ground-floor chamber had neither loop-holes nor air-holes nor windows, there was about as much air and light as in a tomb.

The door to the dungeons, made more of iron than of wood, was in this ground-floor room. Another door opened upon a staircase which led to the upper chambers. All the staircases were contrived in the interior of the wall.

It was into this lower room that the besiegers could arrive by the breach they had made. This hall taken, there would still be the tower to take.

It had always been impossible to breathe in that hall for any length of time. Nobody ever passed twenty-four hours there without suffocating. Now, thanks to the breach, one could exist there.

That was why the besieged had not closed the breach.

Besides, of what service would it have been? The cannon would have re-opened it.

They stuck an iron torch-holder into the wall, and put a torch in it, which lighted the ground-floor.

Now how to defend themselves?

To wall up the hole would be easy, but useless. A retirade would be of more service. A retirade is an intrenchment with a re-entering angle; a sort of V-shaped barricade, which admits of converging the fire upon the assailants, and while leaving the breach open on the outside, blocks it on the inside. Materials were not lacking; they constructed a retirade with fissures for the passage of the gun-barrels. The angle was supported by the central pillar; the wings touched the wall on either side. When this was finished they laid mines in several places.

The marquis directed everything. Inspirer, commander, guide and master, a terrible spirit.

Lantenac belonged to that race of warriors of the eighteenth century who, at the age of eighty, saved cities. He resembled that Count d'Alberg who, when almost a centenarian, drove the King of Poland from Riga.

"Courage, friends!" said the marquis; "at the commencement of this century, in 1713, at Bender, Charles XII., shut up in a house with three hundred Swedes, held his own against twenty thousand Turks."

They barricaded the two lower floors, fortified the chambers, battlemented the alcoves, supported the doors with joists driven in by blows from a mallet, thus forming a sort of buttress; however, it was necessary to leave open the spiral staircase which joined the different floors, for they must be able to get up and down, and to stop it against the besiegers would have been to close it against the besieged. The defense of any place has thus always some weak side.

The marquis, indefatigable, robust as a young man, lifted beams, carried stones, set an example, helped with the work, commanded, aided, fraternized, laughed with this ferocious clan, but remained always the noble, haughty, familiar, elegant, savage.

He permitted no reply to his orders. He had said: "If the half of you should revolt, I would have them shot by the other half, and defend the place with those that were left." Such things as these make a leader beloved.

XIV.

WHAT IMÂNUS DID

While the marquis occupied himself with the breach and the tower, Imânus was busy with the bridge. At the beginning of the siege, the escape-ladder which hung transversely below the windows of the second story had been removed by the marquis' orders, and Imânus had put it in the library. It was, perhaps, the loss of this ladder which Gauvain wished to supply. The windows of the lower floor, called the guard-room, were defended by a triple grating of iron bars set in the stone, so that neither ingress or egress was possible by them.

The library windows had no bars, but they were very high.

Imânus took three men with him, who, like himself, possessed capabilities and resolution that would carry them through anything. These men were Hoisnard, called Branche d'Or, and the two brothers Pique-en-Bois. Imânus took a dark lantern, opened the iron door, and carefully inspected the three stories of the bridge-castle. Hoisnard Branche d'Or was implacable as Imânus, having had a brother killed by the Republicans.

Imânus examined the garret, filled with hay and straw, and the ground-floor, where he had several fire-pots added to the hogsheads of tar; he placed the heap of bundles of heath so that they touched the casks, and assured himself of the good condition of the sulphur-match of which one end was in the bridge and the other in the tower. He spread over the floor, under the hogsheads and heath, a pool of tar in which he dipped the end of the sulphur-match; then he brought into the library, between the ground-floor where the tar was and the garret filled with straw, the three cribs in which lay René-Jean, Gros-Alain and Georgette, buried in deep sleep. They carried the cradles very gently in order not to awaken the little ones.

They were simple country cribs, a sort of low osier basket which set on the floor so that a child could get out of the cradle unaided. Near each cradle Imânus placed a porringer of soup, with a wooden spoon. The escape-ladder, unhooked from its cramp-irons, had been set on the floor against the wall; Imânus arranged the three cribs, end to end, along the wall opposite the ladder. Then, thinking that a current of air might be useful, he opened wide the six windows of the library. The summer night was warm and clear.

He sent the brothers Pique-en-Bois to open the windows of the upper and lower stories. He had noticed, on the eastern façade of the building, a great dried old ivy vine, the color of tinder, which covered the whole of one side of the bridge from top to bottom, and framed in the windows of the three stories. He thought this ivy might be left. Imânus took a last careful glance at everything; that done, the four men left the châtelet and returned to the tower. Imânus double-locked the heavy iron door, studied attentively the enormous bolts, and nodded his head in a satisfied way at the sulphur-match which passed through the hole he had drilled, and was now the sole communication between the tower and the bridge. This train started from the round chamber, passed beneath the iron door, entered under the arch, twisted like a snake down the spiral staircase leading to the lower story of the bridge, crept over the floor, and ended in the heap of dried heath laid on the pool of tar. Imânus had calculated that it would take about a quarter of an hour for this wick, when lighted in the interior of the tower, to set fire to the pool of tar under the library. These arrangements all concluded, and everything carefully inspected, he carried the key of the iron door back to the marquis, who put it in his pocket.

It was important that every movement of the besiegers should be watched. Imânus, with his cowherd's horn in his belt, posted himself as sentinel on the watch-tower of the platform at the top of the tower. While keeping a constant look-out, one eye on the forest and one on the plateau, he worked at making cartridges, having near him, in the embrasure of the watch-tower window, a powder-horn, a canvas bag full of good-sized balls, and some old newspapers which he tore up for wadding.

When the sun rose it gave light in the forest to eight battalions, with sabres at their sides, cartridge-boxes on their backs, and guns with fixed bayonets, ready for the assault; on the plateau, to a battery, with caissons, cartridges, and boxes of grape-shot; within the fortress, to nineteen men loading guns, muskets, blunderbusses, and pistols, and to three children sleeping in their cradles.

BOOK THREE

THE MASSACRE OF SAINT BARTHOLOMEW

I.

The children awoke.

The little one was the first to open her eyes.

The awakening of children is like the opening of flowers; a perfume seems to exhale from those fresh young souls.

Georgette, twenty months old, the youngest of the three, who was still a nursling in the month of May, raised her little head, sat up in her cradle, looked at her feet, and began to chatter.

A ray of the morning fell across her crib; it would have been difficult to decide which was the rosiest, Georgette's foot or the dawn.

The other two still slept; the slumber of boys is heavier. Georgette, gay and happy, was talking to herself.

René-Jean's hair was brown, Gros-Alain's was auburn, Georgette's was blonde. These tints would change later in life. René-Jean had the look of an infant Hercules; he slept lying on his stomach, with his two fists in his eyes. Gros-Alain had thrust his legs outside his little bed.

All three were in rags; the garments given them by the battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge had worn to shreds; they had not even a shirt between them. The two boys were almost naked; Georgette was muffled in a rag which had once been a petticoat, but was now little more than a jacket. Who had taken care of these children? it was impossible to say. Not a mother. These savage peasant fighters, who dragged them along from forest to forest, had given them their portion of soup. That was all. The little ones lived as they could. They had everybody for a master and nobody for a father. But even about the rags of childhood there hangs a halo. These three tiny creatures were lovely.

Georgette prattled.

A bird sings, a child prattles. It is the same hymn. A hymn indistinct, inarticulate, but full of profound meaning. The child, unlike the bird, has the sombre destiny of humanity before it. This thought saddens the man who listens to the joyous song of a child. The most sublime psalm that can be heard on this earth is the lisping of a human soul from the lips of childhood. This confused murmur of thought, which is as yet only instinct, contains a strange, unreasoning appeal to eternal justice; perchance it is a protest against life while standing on its threshold; a protest unconscious, yet heart-rending; this ignorance, smiling at infinity, lays upon all creation the burden of the destiny which shall be offered to this feeble, unarmed creature. If unhappiness comes, it seems like a betrayal of trust.

The babble of an infant is more and less than speech; it is not notes, and yet it is a song; not syllables, and yet a language; a murmur that began in heaven and will not finish on earth; it commenced before human birth, and will continue in the sphere beyond; it is a completion. These lispings are the echo of what the child said when it was an angel and of what it will say when it is a man; the cradle has a Yesterday, even as the grave has a To-morrow; this to-morrow and this yesterday join their double mystery in that incomprehensible warbling; and there is no such proof of God, of eternity, of responsibility and of duality of destiny, as this awe-inspiring shadow flung across that flower-like soul.

There was nothing saddening in Georgette's prattle, for the whole of her lovely face was a smile. Her mouth smiled, her eyes smiled, the dimples in her cheeks smiled. There was a serene acceptance of the morning expressed in this smile. The soul has faith in the sunlight. The sky was blue, warm, beautiful.

This frail creature, who knew nothing, who comprehended nothing, softly cradled in a dream which was not thought, felt herself in safety amidst this loveliness of nature, in this landscape fair and peaceful, with its noises of birds, brooks, insects, leaves, above which glowed the harmless brightness of the sun.

After Georgette, René-Jean, the eldest, who was more than four years old, awoke. He sat up, jumped in a manly way over the side of his cradle, discovered the porringer, considered that quite natural, and so sat down on the floor and began to eat his soup.

Georgette's prattle had not awakened Gros-Alain, but at the sound of the spoon in the porringer, he turned over with a start, and opened his eyes. Gros-Alain was three years old. He saw his bowl, he had only to stretch out his arm, he took it, and, without leaving his bed, he followed René-Jean's example, seized the spoon in his little fist, and began to eat, holding the bowl on his knees.

Georgette did not hear them, and the modulations of her voice seemed measured by the cradling of a dream. Her great eyes, gazing upward, were divine; no matter how dark the ceiling in the vault above the child's head, heaven is reflected in its eyes.

When René-Jean had finished his portion, he scraped the bottom of the bowl with his spoon, sighed, and said with dignity: "I have eaten my soup."

This roused Georgette from her reverie.

"Thoup!" said she.

And seeing that René-Jean had eaten and that Gros-Alain was eating, she took the porringer which was placed beside her cradle, and began to eat, not without carrying the spoon to her ear much oftener than to her mouth.

From time to time she renounced civilization and ate with her fingers.

When Gros-Alain, like his brother, had scraped the bottom of his porringer, he leaped out of bed and ran to join him.

II.

Suddenly from without, down below, on the side of the forest, came the stern, loud ring of a trumpet. To this clarion-blast a horn from the top of the tower replied.

This time it was the trumpet which called, and the horn which made answer.

The trumpet blew a second summons and the horn again replied.

Then, from the edge of the forest, rose a voice, distant but clear, which cried thus:

"Brigands! a warning! If at sunset you have not surrendered at discretion, we commence the attack."

A voice, which sounded like the roar of a wild animal, answered from the summit of the tower:

"Attack!"

The voice from below resumed, "A cannon will be fired, as a last warning, half an hour before the assault."

The voice from on high repeated:

"Attack!"

These voices did not reach the children, but the trumpet and the horn rose loud and clear, and Georgette, at the first sound of the trumpet, lifted her head and stopped eating; at the sound of the horn, she dropped her spoon into the porringer; at the second blast of the trumpet, she lifted the little forefinger of her right hand, and, raising and depressing it in turn, marked the cadences of the flourish which prolonged the blast; when the trumpet and the horn ceased, she remained with her finger pensively lifted and softly said: "Muthic."

We suppose that she wished to say, "music."

The two older children, René-Jean and Gros-Alain, had paid no attention to the trumpet and horn; they were absorbed by something else; a wood-louse was just making a journey across the library floor.

Gros-Alain perceived it, and cried:

"There's a beast!"

René-Jean ran up.

Gros-Alain continued:

"It pricks."

"Do not hurt it," said René-Jean.

And both stood watching the traveler.

In the meanwhile Georgette had finished her soup; she looked about for her brothers. René-Jean and Gros-Alain were in the recess of one of the windows, gravely stooping over the wood-louse; their foreheads touching, their curls mingling; they held their breath in wonder, and examined the insect, which had stopped and did not attempt to move, little appreciating the admiration it received.

Georgette, seeing that her brothers were watching something, must needs know what it was. It was not an easy matter to reach them, still she undertook the journey; the way was full of difficulties; there were things scattered over the floor, heaps of old papers, boxes forced open and empty, trunks, rubbish of all sorts, in and out of which it was necessary to sail, a whole archipelago of reefs; but Georgette risked it. The first task was to get out of her crib; then she entered the chain of reefs, twisted herself through the straits, pushed a footstool aside, crept between two coffers, got over a heap of papers, climbing up one side and rolling down the other, regardless of the exposure to her poor little naked legs, and succeeded in reaching what a sailor would have called an open sea, that is, a sufficiently wide space of the floor which was not littered over, and where there were no more perils; then she bounded forward, traversed this space, which was the whole width of the room, on all fours with the agility of a kitten, and got near to the window, there a formidable obstacle presented itself; the great ladder lying along the wall reached to this window, the end of it passing a little beyond the corner of the recess; this formed between Georgette and her brothers a sort of cape, which must be rounded; she stopped and meditated; her internal monologue ended, she came to a decision; she resolutely twisted her rosy fingers about one of the rungs, which were vertical, as the ladder lay on its side; she tried to raise herself on her feet, and fell back; she began again, and fell a second time; the third effort was successful; then, standing up, she caught hold of the rounds in succession, and walked the length of the ladder; when she reached the extremity there was nothing more to support her; she tottered, but seizing with her little hands the end of one of the uprights, which were immense, she rose again, doubled the promontory, looked at René-Jean and Gros-Alain, and began to laugh.

III.

At that instant, René-Jean, satisfied with the result of his examination of the wood-louse, raised his head, and said:

"It's a she-beast."

Georgette's laughter made René-Jean laugh, and René-Jean's laughter made Gros-Alain laugh.

Georgette seated herself beside her brothers, the recess forming a sort of little reception chamber.

But the wood-louse had disappeared.

It had taken advantage of Georgette's laughter to hide himself in a crack of the floor.

Other incidents followed the wood-louse's visit.

First, a flock of swallows passed.

They probably had their nests under the edge of the overhanging roof. They flew close to the window, a little startled by the sight of the children, describing great circles in the air, and uttering their melodious spring song. The sound made the three little ones look up, and the wood-louse was forgotten.

Georgette pointed her finger toward the swallows, and cried:

"Chicks!"

René-Jean reprimanded her.

"Mamoiselle, you must not call them chicks, they are birds."

"Birz," repeated Georgette.

And all three watched the swallows.

Then a bee entered.

There is nothing so like a soul as a bee. It goes from flower to flower as a soul from star to star, and gathers honey as the soul does light.

This visitor made a great noise as it came in, it buzzed at the top of its voice, and seemed to say: "I have come, I have first been to see the roses, now I come to see the children. What is going on here?"

A bee is a housewife, its song is a grumble.

The children did not take their eyes off the bee as long as it stayed with them.

The bee explored the library, rummaged in the corners, fluttered about with the air of being at home in a hive, and wandered, winged and melodious, from book-case to book-case, examining the titles of the volumes through the glass doors as if it had been gifted with a mind.

Its exploration finished, it departed.

"She is going to her own house," said René-Jean.

"It is a beast," said Gros-Alain.

"No," replied René-Jean, "it is a fly."

"A f'y," said Georgette.

Thereupon Gros-Alain, who had just found on the floor a cord, with a knot in one end, took the other end between his thumb and forefinger, and made a sort of windmill of the string, watching its whirls with profound attention.

On her side, Georgette, having turned into a quadruped again and recommenced her capricious course back and forward across the floor, had discovered a venerable tapestry covered arm-chair, so eaten by moths that the horse-hair stuck out in several places. She stopped before this seat. She enlarged the holes and diligently pulled out the long hairs.

Suddenly she lifted one finger, that meant: "Listen."

The two brothers turned their heads.

A vague, distant noise surged up from without; it was probably the attacking camp executing some strategic manœuvre in the forest; horses neighed, drums beat, caissons rolled, chains clanked, military calls and responses, a confusion of savage sounds whose mingling formed a sort of harmony; the children listened in delight.

"It is the good God who does that," said René-Jean.

IV.

The noise ceased.

René-Jean remained lost in a dream.

How do ideas vanish and reform themselves in the brains of those little ones? What is the mysterious motive of those memories at once so troubled and so brief? There was in that sweet, pensive little brain a mingling of ideas of the good God, of prayer, of joined hands, the light of a tender smile it had formerly known and no longer knew, and René-Jean murmured, half aloud: "Mamma."

"Mamma," repeated Gros-Alain.

"Mamma," cried Georgette.

And then René-Jean began to leap.

Seeing this, Gros-Alain also leaped.

Gros-Alain repeated every movement and gesture of René-Jean; Georgette did not. Three years copies four years; but twenty months keeps its independence.

Georgette remained seated, uttering a word from time to time. Georgette could not yet manage sentences. She was a thinker; she spoke in apothegms. She was monosyllabic.

Still, after a little, the example proved more than she could resist, and she ended by trying to imitate her brothers, and these three little pairs of naked feet began to dance, to run, to totter amidst the dust of the old polished oak floor, beneath the grave gaze of the marble busts toward which Georgette from time to time cast an unquiet glance, murmuring: "Dhosts!"

In Georgette's language, a "dhost" was something which looked like a man, but yet was not one. Perhaps the first glimmering of an idea in regard to phantoms.

Georgette, oscillating rather than walking, followed her brothers, but her favorite mode of locomotion was on all-fours.

Suddenly René-Jean, who had gone near a window, lifted his head, then dropped it, and hastened to hide himself in a corner of the wall made by the projecting window recess. He had just caught sight of a man looking at him. It was a soldier, from the encampment of the Blues on the plateau, who, profiting by the truce and perhaps infringing on it a little, had ventured to the very edge of the ravine, from whence the interior of the library was visible. Seeing René-Jean hide himself, Gros-Alain hid too, he crouched down beside his brother, and Georgette hurried to hide herself behind them. So they remained, silent, motionless, Georgette pressing her finger against her lips. After a few moments, René-Jean ventured to thrust out his head; the soldier was there still. René-Jean retreated quickly, and the three little ones dared not even breathe. This suspense lasted for some time. Finally the fear began to bore Georgette; she gathered courage to look out. The soldier had disappeared. They began again to run about and play.

Gros-Alain, although the imitator and admirer of René-Jean, had a specialty, that of discoveries. His brother and sister saw him suddenly galloping wildly about dragging after him a little cart which he had unearthed behind some box.

This doll's wagon had lain for years among the dust, forgotten, living amicably in the neighborhood of the works of genius and the busts of sages. It was, perhaps, one of the toys that Gauvain had played with when a child.

Gros-Alain had made a whip of his string and cracked it loudly; he was very proud. Such are discoverers. The child could not discover an America, he discovers a little wagon. The spirit of adventure is the same.

But it was necessary to share the godsend. René-Jean wished to harness himself to the carriage, and Georgette wished to ride in it.

She succeeded in seating herself. René-Jean was the horse. Gros-Alain was the coachman.

But the coachman did not understand his business, the horse began to teach him.

René-Jean shouted to Gros-Alain, "Say, 'Whoa!'"

"Whoa!" repeated Gros-Alain.

The carriage upset. Georgette rolled out. Child-angels can shriek. Georgette did so.

Then she had a vague desire to weep.

"Mademoiselle," said René-Jean, "you are too big."

"Me big," stammered Georgette.

And her size consoled her for her fall.

The cornice of the entablature outside the windows was very broad; the dust blowing from the plain of heath had collected there, the rains had hardened it into soil, the wind had brought seeds; a blackberry-bush had profited by the shallow bed, to grow up there. This bush belonged to the species called fox blackberry. It was August now, and the bush was covered with berries, and a branch of the bush passed in by the window, and hung down nearly to the floor.

Gros-Alain, after having discovered the cord, had discovered the wagon, and had now discovered this bramble. He went up to it.

He picked a berry and ate it.

"I am hungry," said René-Jean.

And Georgette arrived, galloping up on her hands and knees.

The three between them stripped the branch and ate all the berries. They stained their faces and hands with the purple juice till the trio of little seraphs was changed into a knot of little fauns, which would have shocked Dante and charmed Virgil. They shrieked with laughter.

From time to time the thorns pricked their fingers. There is always a pain attached to every pleasure.

Georgette held out her finger to René-Jean, on which showed a tiny drop of blood, and said, pointing to the bushes: "P'icks."

Gros-Alain, who had suffered also, looked suspiciously at the branch, and said: "It is a beast."

"No," replied René-Jean; "it is a stick."

"Then a stick is bad," retorted Gros-Alain.

Again Georgette, although she had a mind to cry, burst out laughing.

V.

In the meantime René-Jean, jealous perhaps of the discoveries made by his younger brother Gros-Alain, had conceived a grand project. For some minutes past, while busy gathering the berries and pricking his fingers, his eyes turned frequently toward the chorister's desk, mounted on a pivot, and isolated like a monument in the centre of the library. On this desk lay the celebrated volume of Saint Bartholomew.

It was, in truth, a magnificent and priceless folio. This Saint Bartholomew had been published at Cologne by the famous publisher of the Bible of 1682, Blœuv, or, in Latin, Cœsius. It was printed, not on Dutch paper, but upon that beautiful Arabian paper so much admired by Édrisi, which was made of silk and cotton and never grew yellow; the binding was of leather, tooled, and the clasps of silver; the guards were of that parchment which the parchment sellers of Paris took an oath to buy at the Hall of Saint-Mathurin "and nowhere else." The volume was full of engravings on wood and copper, with geographical maps of many countries; it had on a fly-leaf a protest of the printers, paper-makers, and publishers, against the law of 1635, which set a tax on "leather, coffins, cloven-footed animals, sea-fish, and paper," and on the back of the frontispiece could be read a dedication to the Gryphes, who were to Lyons what the Elzevirs were to Amsterdam. These combinations resulted in a famous copy, almost as rare as the Apostol at Moscow.

The book was beautiful; it was for that reason René-Jean looked at it, too long perhaps. The volume chanced to be open at a great print representing Saint Bartholomew carrying his skin over his arm. He could see this print where he stood. When the berries were all eaten, René-Jean watched it with a feverish longing, and Georgette, following the direction of her brother's eyes, perceived the engraving, and said: "Pic'sure."

This exclamation seemed to decide René-Jean. Then, to the utter amazement of Gros-Alain, an extraordinary thing happened.

A great oaken chair stood in one corner of the library; René-Jean marched toward it, seized, and dragged it unaided up to the desk. Then, when the chair was close to the desk, he mounted thereon and laid his two hands on the volume.

Arrived at this summit, he felt a necessity for being magnificently generous; he took hold of the upper end of the "pic'sure" and carefully tore it; the tear went diagonally through Saint Bartholomew, but that was not the fault of René-Jean; it left in the book the left side with one eye and a bit of the halo of the old apocryphal evangelist, and offered Georgette the other half of the saint and all his skin. Georgette took the saint, and said: "Dhosts."

"And I!" cried Gros-Alain.

The tearing of the first page is like the shedding of the first drop of blood. It decides the carnage.

René-Jean turned the leaf; next to the saint came the commentator, Pantœnus. René-Jean bestowed Pantœnus upon Gros-Alain.

Meanwhile Georgette tore her large piece into two little pieces, then the two into four; so well did she do her work that history might have noted that Saint Bartholomew, after having been flayed in Armenia, was torn limb from limb in Brittany.

VI.

The quartering completed, Georgette held out her hand to René-Jean, and said: "More!"

After the saint and the commentator followed portraits of frowning glossarists. The first in the procession was Gavantus; René-Jean tore him out, and put Gavantus into Georgette's hand.

The whole group of Saint Bartholomew's glossarists met the same fate in turn.

There is a sense of superiority in giving. René-Jean kept nothing for himself. Gros-Alain and Georgette were watching him; he was satisfied with that; the admiration of his public was sufficient reward.

René-Jean, inexhaustible in his magnanimity, offered Fabricio Pignatelli to Gros-Alain and Father Stilting to Georgette; he followed these by the bestowal of Alphonse Tostat on Gros-Alain and Cornelius a Lapide upon Georgette; then Gros-Alain received Henry Hammond and Georgette had Father Roberti, together with a view of the city of Douai, where he was born in 1619. Gros-Alain received the protest of the paper-makers, and Georgette obtained the dedication to the Gryphes. Then it was the turn of the maps. René-Jean distributed them. He gave Gros-Alain Ethiopia and Lycaonia fell to Georgette. This done he tumbled the book upon the floor.

This was a terrible moment. With mingled ecstasy and fright, Gros-Alain and Georgette saw René-Jean wrinkle his brows, stiffen his legs, clench his fists, and push the massive volume off the stand. A majestic old tome undergoing destruction is a tragic spectacle. Pushed from its resting-place, the heavy volume hung for an instant on the edge of the desk, seemed to hesitate, trying to balance itself, then crashed down, and, broken, crumpled, torn, ripped from its binding, its clasps fractured, flattened itself miserably upon the floor. Fortunately it did not fall on the children.

They were only bewildered, not crushed. Victories do not always finish so well.

Like all glories it made a great noise and a cloud of dust.

Having flung the book on the ground, René-Jean descended from the chair.

There was a moment of silence and fright; victory has its terrors. The three children seized one another's hands and stood at a distance, looking at the vast dismantled volume.

But, after a brief reverie, Gros-Alain approached it quickly and gave it a kick.

Nothing more was needed. The appetite for destruction grows rapidly. René-Jean kicked it, Georgette dealt a blow with her little foot which overset her, though she fell in a sitting position; she took advantage of this to fling herself on Saint Bartholomew; the spell was completely broken; René-Jean pounced upon the saint, Gros-Alain dashed upon him, and joyous, distracted, triumphant, pitiless, tearing the prints, slashing the leaves, pulling out the markers, scratching the binding, tearing off the gilded leather, breaking off the nails from the silver corners, breaking the parchment guards, making mince-meat of the august text, working with feet, hands, nails, teeth, rosy, laughing, ferocious, the three angels of prey demolished the defenseless evangelist.

They annihilated Armenia, Judea, Benevento, where rest the relics of the saint, Nathanael, who is, perhaps, the same as Bartholomew, the Pope Gelasius, who declared the Gospel of Bartholomew-Nathanael apocryphal, all the portraits, all the maps, and the pitiless massacre of the old book, absorbed them so entirely that a mouse ran past without their perceiving it.

It was an extermination.

To tear in pieces history, legend, science, miracles, whether true or false, the Latin of the Church, superstitions, fanaticisms, mysteries, to rend a whole religion from top to bottom, would be a work for three giants, but the three children completed it; hours passed in the labor, but they reached the end; nothing remained of Saint Bartholomew.

When they had finished, when the last page was loosened, the last print was lying on the ground, when nothing was left of the book but the edges of the text and pictures in the skeleton of the binding, René-Jean sprang to his feet, looked at the floor covered with scattered leaves, and clapped his hands.

Gros-Alain likewise clapped his hands.

Georgette took one of the pages in her hand, rose, leaned against the window-sill, which was on a level with her chin, and commenced to tear the great leaf into tiny bits, and scatter them out of the casement.

Seeing this, René-Jean and Gros-Alain began the same work. They picked up and tore into small bits, picked up again and tore, and flung the pieces out of the window, as Georgette had done; and, page by page, rent by these desperate little fingers, almost the entire ancient volume flew down on the wind. Georgette thoughtfully watched these swarms of little white papers dispersed by the breeze, and said:

"Butterf'ies!"

So the massacre ended with these tiny ghosts vanishing in the blue of heaven.

VII.

Thus was Saint Bartholomew for the second time made a martyr, he who had been the first time sacrificed in the year of our Lord 49.

Then the evening came, the heat increased, there was sleep in the air, Georgette's eyes began to close, René-Jean went to his crib, pulled out the straw sack which served as a mattress, dragged it to the window, stretched himself thereon, and said: "Let us go to bed."

Gros-Alain laid his head against René-Jean, Georgette placed hers on Gros-Alain, and the three mischief workers fell asleep.

The warm breeze entered by the open windows; the perfume of wild flowers from the ravines and hills mingled with the breath of evening; nature was calm and pitiful; everything beamed, was at peace, full of love; the sun gave its caress, which is light, to all creation; everywhere could be heard and felt that harmony which is thrown off from the infinite sweetness of inanimate things; there is a motherhood in the infinite; creation is a miracle in full bloom; she perfects her grandeur by her goodness; it seemed as if one could feel some invisible being take those mysterious precautions which in the formidable conflict of opposing elements of life protect the weak against the strong; at the same time there was beauty everywhere; the splendor equaled the gentleness. The landscape that seemed asleep had those lovely hazy effects which the changings of light and shadow produce on the fields and rivers; the mists mounted toward the clouds like reveries changing into dreams; the birds circled noisily about La Tourgue; the swallows looked in through the windows, as if they wished to be certain that the children slept well. They were prettily grouped upon one another, motionless, half-naked, posed like little cupids; they were adorable and pure, the united ages of the three did not make nine years; they were dreaming dreams of paradise which were reflected on their lips in vague smiles, perchance God whispered in their ears, they were of those whom all human languages call the weak and blessed, they were made majestic by innocence; all was silence about them, as if the breath from their tender breasts were the care of the universe and listened to by the whole creation, the leaves did not rustle, the grass did not stir, it seemed as if the vast starry world held its breath for fear of disturbing these three humble angelic sleepers, and nothing could have been so sublime as that reverent respect of nature in the presence of this littleness.

The sun was near its setting and almost touched the horizon. Suddenly, across this profound peace, burst a lightning-like glare, which came from the forest, then a savage noise. A cannon had just been fired. The echoes seized upon this thundering and repeated it with an infernal din. The prolonged growling from hill to hill was terrible. It woke Georgette.

She raised her head slightly, lifted her little finger, listened, and said:

"Boom!"

The noise died away, all was again quiet, Georgette laid her head on Gros-Alain, and once more fell asleep.

BOOK FOUR

THE MOTHER

I.

DEATH PASSES

When this evening came, the mother, whom we saw wandering almost at random, had walked the whole day. This was indeed the history of all her days, to go straight before her without stopping. For her slumbers of exhaustion in any corner that chanced to be nearest were no more rest than the morsels she ate here and there, as the birds pick up crumbs, were nourishment. She ate and slept as much as was absolutely necessary to keep her from falling down dead.

She had passed the previous night in an empty barn; civil wars leave many such; she had found in a bare field four walls, an open door, a little straw beneath the ruins of a roof, and she had slept on this straw and under these rafters, feeling the rats slip about beneath, and watching through the roof above the rising of the stars. She slept for several hours; then she awoke in the middle of the night and set out again in order to get over as much road as possible before the great heat of the day should set in. For anyone who travels on foot in the summer, midnight is more fitting than noon.

She had followed to the best of her ability the brief itinerary the peasant of Vautortes had marked out for her; she had gone as straight as possible toward the west. Had there been any one near, they might have heard her ceaselessly murmur, half aloud: "La Tourgue." Except the names of her children, this word was all she knew.

As she walked, she dreamed. She thought of the adventures with which she had met; she thought of all that she had suffered, of all that she had accepted; of the meetings, the indignities, the terms offered, the bargains proposed and submitted to, now for a shelter, now for a morsel of bread, sometimes simply to obtain from some one information as to her route. A wretched woman is more unfortunate than a wretched man, because she is an instrument of pleasure. Frightful wandering march! But nothing mattered to her provided she could discover her children.

Her first encounter, this day, had been a village; the dawn was beginning to break; everything was still tinged with the gloom of night; a few doors were already half open in the principal street of the village, and curious faces looked out of the windows. The inhabitants were agitated like a disturbed bee-hive. This arose from a noise of wheels and chains which had been heard.

On the square before the church, a frightened group, with heads raised, watched something descend a high hill along the road toward the village. It was a four-wheeled wagon drawn by five horses harnessed with chains. On this wagon could be distinguished a heap like a pile of long joists, in the middle of which lay some shapeless object; it was covered with a large canvas, resembling a pall. Ten horsemen rode in front of the wagon and ten others behind. These men wore three-cornered hats, and above their shoulders rose what seemed to be the points of naked sabres. This whole procession, advancing slowly, showed black and distinct against the horizon. The wagon looked black, the harness looked black, the horsemen looked black. Behind them gleamed the whiteness of the morning.

They entered the village and moved toward the square.

Daylight had come while the wagon was going down the hill, and the men could be distinctly seen, it was like a procession of shadows, for not a man in the party uttered a word.

The horsemen were gendarmes. They did in reality carry drawn sabres. The covering was black.

The wretched wandering mother entered the village from the opposite side and approached the knot of peasants at the same time that the wagon and gendarmes entered the square. Among the crowd voices whispered questions and replies.

"What is it?"

"The guillotine."

"Whence does it come?"

"From Fougères."

"Where is it going?"

"I do not know. They say to a castle in the neighborhood of Parigné."

"To Parigné!"

"Let it go where it likes, provided it does not stop here!"

This great cart with its load hidden by a sort of shroud, this team, these gendarmes, the noise of the chains, the silence of the men, the gray dawn, all made up a whole that was ghostly.

The group crossed the square and passed out of the village; the hamlet lay in a hollow between two hills; at the end of a quarter of an hour, the peasants, who had stood still as if petrified, saw the mournful procession reappear on the summit of the western hill. The heavy wheels jolted along the ruts, the chains clanked in the morning air, the sabres glistened; the sun rose. Then the road turned off and everything disappeared.

It was the very instant when Georgette awoke in the library by the side of her still sleeping brothers, and said good-morning to her rosy feet.

II.

DEATH SPEAKS

The mother had watched the passing of this mysterious procession, but had neither understood nor sought to understand, having before her eyes another vision, her children lost amidst the darkness.

She also went out of the village, shortly after the procession had filed past, and followed the same route at some distance behind the second squad of gendarmes. Suddenly the word "guillotine" recurred to her; "guillotine," said she to herself; this rude peasant, Michelle Fléchard, did not know what that was; but instinct warned her; she shivered, without being able to tell why; it seemed horrible to her to walk behind this thing, and she turned to the left, quitted the high-road, and passed into a wood, which was the forest of Fougères.

After wandering for some time, she perceived a belfry and some roofs, it was one of the villages scattered along the edge of the forest, she went toward it. She was hungry.

It was one of the villages in which the Republicans had established military posts.

She passed on to the square in front of the mayoralty.

In this village there was also fear and anxiety. A crowd surged up to the flight of steps which led to the mansion. On the top step stood a man, escorted by soldiers, who held in his hand a great open placard. At his right was stationed a drummer, and at his left a bill-sticker carrying a paste-pot and brush.

Upon the balcony over the door appeared the mayor, wearing a tricolored scarf over his peasant dress.

The man with the placard was a public crier.

He wore his shoulder-belt, with a small wallet hanging from it, a sign that he was going from village to village, and that he had something to publish throughout the district.

At the moment Michelle Fléchard approached, he had unfolded the placard, and was beginning to read. He read in a loud voice:

"The French Republic, one and indivisible."

The drum beat. There was a sort of movement among the assembly. A few took off their caps; others pulled their hats further over their heads. At that time and in that country, one could almost recognize the political opinions of a man by his head-gear; hats were Royalists, caps were Republicans. The confused murmur of voices ceased, everybody listened, the crier read:

"By virtue of the orders we have received and the authority vested us by the Committee of Public Safety . . ."

The drum beat a second time. The crier continued:

. . . "And in execution of the decree of the National Convention which declares outlaws all rebels taken with arms in their hands, and which ordains capital punishment to whomsoever shall give them shelter or help them to escape . . ."

A peasant asked, in a low voice, of his neighbor:

"What is that, capital punishment?"

His neighbor replied:

"I do not know."

The crier rattled the placard:

. . . "In accordance with Article 17 of the law of April 30, which gives full power to delegates and sub-delegates against rebels,

"We declare outlaws . . ."

He paused and resumed:

. . . "The individuals known under the names and surnames which follow . . ."

The whole assemblage listened intently.

The crier's voice sounded like thunder. He read:

. . . "Lantenac, brigand."

"That is monseigneur," murmured a peasant.

And through the whole crowd went the whisper: "That is monseigneur."

The crier resumed:

. . . "Lantenac, ci-devant marquis, brigand.—Imânus, brigand . . ."

Two peasants glanced sideways at each other.

"That is Gouge-le-Bruant."

"Yes, it is Bris-Bleu."

The crier continued to read the list:

"Grand-Francœur, brigand . . ."

The assembly murmured:

"He is a priest."

"Yes, Monsieur the Abbé Turmeau."

"Yes, he is curé somewhere in the neighborhood of the wood of La Chapelle."

"And a brigand," said a man in a cap.

The crier read:

. . . "Boisnouveau, brigand. — The two brothers, Pique-en-Bois, brigands.—Houzard, brigand . . ."

"That is Monsieur de Quélen," said a peasant.

"Panier, brigand . . ."

"That is Monsieur Sepher."

"Place-Nette, brigand . . ."

"That is Monsieur Jamois."

The crier continued his reading without paying any attention to these comments:

. . . "Guinoiseau, brigand. — Chatenay, alias Robi, brigand . . ."

A peasant whispered:

"Guinoiseau is the same as Le Blond, Chatenay is from Saint-Ouen."

. . . "Hoisnard, brigand," said the crier.

And among the crowd could be heard:

"He is from Ruillé."

"Yes, it is Branche-d'Or."

"His brother was killed in the attack on Pontorson."

"Yes, Hoisnard-Malonnière."

"A fine young fellow of nineteen."

"Attention," said the crier. "Listen to the last of the list:—"Belle-Vigne, brigand. La Musette, brigand.—Sabretout, brigand.—Brin-d'Amour, brigand . . ."

A lad pushed the elbow of a young girl. The girl smiled.

The crier continued: "Chante-en-hiver, brigand.—Le Chat, brigand . . ."

A peasant said:

"That is Moulard."

"Tabouze, brigand . . ."

Another peasant said:

"That is Gauffre."

"There are two of the Gauffres," added a woman.

"Both good fellows," grumbled a lad.

The crier shook the placard and the drum beat.

The crier resumed his reading:

"The above-named, in whatsoever place taken, and their identity established, shall immediately be put to death."

There was a movement among the crowd.

The crier went on:

. . . "Any one affording them shelter or aiding their escape will be brought before a court-martial and put to death. Signed . . ."

The silence grew profound.

. . . "Signed: The Delegate of the Committee of Public Safety, CIMOURDAIN."

"A priest," said a peasant.

"The former curé of Parigné," said another.

A townsman added:

"Turmeau and Cimourdain. A Blue priest and a White priest."

"Both black," said another townsman.

The mayor, who was on the balcony, lifted his hat, and cried:

"Long live the Republic!"

A roll of the drum announced that the crier had not finished. In fact, he was making a sign with his hand.

"Attention!" said he. "Listen to the last four lines of the Government proclamation. They are signed by the chief of the exploring column of the Côtes-du-Nord, Commandant Gauvain."

"Listen!" exclaimed the voices of the crowd.

And the crier read:

"Under pain of death . . . "

All were silent.

"It is forbidden, in accordance with the above order, to give aid or succor to the nineteen rebels above named, at this time shut up and surrounded in La Tourgue."

"What?" cried a voice.

It was the voice of a woman. It was the voice of the mother.

III.

MUTTERINGS AMONG THE PEASANTS

Michelle Fléchard had mingled with the crowd. She had listened to nothing, but one hears certain things without listening. She caught the words La Tourgue. She raised her head.

"What?" repeated she, "La Tourgue!"

People stared at her. She appeared out of her mind. She was in rags. Voices murmured: "She looks like a brigand."

A peasant woman, who carried a basket of buckwheat biscuits, drew near and said to her in a low voice:

"Be quiet!"

Michelle Fléchard gazed stupidly at the woman. Again she understood nothing. The name La Tourgue had passed through her mind like a flash of lightning, and the darkness closed anew behind it. Had she not a right to ask information? What had she done that they should stare at her in this way?

But the drum had beat for the last time, the bill-sticker posted up the placard, the mayor retired into the house, the crier set out for some other village, and the mob dispersed.

A group remained before the placard. Michelle Fléchard joined this knot of people.

They were commenting on the names of the men declared outlaws.

There were peasants and townsmen among them, that is to say, Whites and Blues.

A peasant was saying:

"After all, they have not caught everybody. Nineteen are only nineteen. They have not got Priou, they have not got Benjamin Moulins, they have not got Goupil of the parish of Andouillé."

"Nor Lorieul of Monjean," said another.

Others added:

"Nor Brice-Denys."

"Nor François Dudouet."

"Yes, of Laval."

"Nor Huet of Launey-Villiers."

"Nor Grégis."

"Nor Pilon."

"Nor Filleul."

"Nor Ménicent."

"Nor Guéharrée."

"Nor the three brothers Logerais."

"Nor Monsieur Lechandelier de Pierreville."

"Idiots!" said a stern-faced, white-haired old man. "They have all, if they have Lantenac."

"They have not got him yet," murmured one of the young men.

The old man added:

"Lantenac taken, the soul is taken. Lantenac dead, La Vendée is slain."

"Who, then, is this Lantenac?" asked a townsman.

A townsman replied:

"He is a ci-devant."

Another added, "He is one of those who shoot women."

Michelle Fléchard heard and said:

"It is true."

They turned toward her.

And she continued:

"For he shot me."

It was a strange speech; it was like hearing a living woman declare herself dead. People began to look at her a little suspiciously.

She was indeed a startling object; trembling at everything, scared, quaking, showing a sort of wild-animal trouble, so frightened that she was frightful. There is always something terrible in the feebleness of a despairing woman. She is a creature who has reached the furthest limits of destiny. But peasants have not a habit of noticing details.

One of them muttered: "She might easily be a spy."

"Hold your tongue and get away from here," said the good woman, who had already spoken to her, in a low tone.

Michelle Fléchard replied:

"I am doing no harm. I am looking for my children."

The good woman glanced at those who were staring at Michelle, touched her forehead with one finger and winked, saying: "She is crazy."

Then she took her aside and gave her a biscuit.

Michelle Fléchard, without thanking her, began to eat greedily.

"Yes," said the peasants, "she eats like an animal. She is an idiot."

So the tail of the mob dwindled away. They all went away, one after another.

When Michelle Fléchard had devoured her biscuit, she said to the peasant woman:

"Good! I have eaten. Now, where is La Tourgue?"

"It is taking her again!" cried the peasant.

"I must go to La Tourgue. Show me the way to La Tourgue."

"Never!" exclaimed the peasant. "Do you want to get yourself killed, eh? Besides, I don't know. Oh, see here! You are really crazy! Listen, poor woman, you look tired. Will you come to my house and rest yourself?"

"I never rest," said Michelle Fléchard.

"And her feet are torn to pieces," murmured the peasant.

Michelle Fléchard resumed:

"I tell you that they have stolen my children. A little girl and two boys. I come from the den in the forest. You can ask Tellmarch the Caimand about me. And the man I met in the field down yonder. It was the Caimand who cured me. It seems I had something broken. All that is what happened to me. Then there is Sergeant Radoub. You can ask him. He will tell thee. Because he was the one we met in the wood. Three. I tell you three children. Also that the oldest one is called René-Jean. I can prove all that. The other is called Gros-Alain, and the little girl is Georgette. My husband is dead. They killed him. He was the farmer at Siscoignard. You look like a good woman. Show me the road. I am not crazy, I am a mother. I have lost my children. I am trying to find them. That is all. I don't know exactly which way I have come. I slept last night in a barn on the straw. La Tourgue, that is where I am going. I am not a thief. You must see that I am telling the truth.

You ought to help me find my children. I do not belong to the neighborhood. I was shot, but I do not know where."

The peasant shook her head, and said:

"Listen, traveler. In times of revolution you mustn't say things that cannot be understood. You may get yourself made prisoner in that way."

"But La Tourgue!" cried the mother. "Madame, for the love of the Child Jesus and the Blessed Virgin up in Paradise, I pray you, madame, I beg you, I entreat you, tell me which way I must go to get to La Tourgue!"

The peasant woman went into a passion.

"I do not know! and if I knew I would not tell! It is a bad place. People do not go there."

"But I am going," said the mother.

And she set out again. The woman watched her depart, and grumbled:

"Still, she must have something to eat."

She ran after Michelle Fléchard and put a roll of black bread in her hand.

"There is something for your supper."

Michelle Fléchard took the buckwheat bread, did not answer, did not turn her head, but walked on.

She went out of the village. As she neared the last houses, she met three ragged and barefooted little children. She approached them, and said:

"These are two girls and a boy."

And noticing that they looked at the bread, she gave it to them.

The children took the bread, then grew frightened.

She plunged into the forest.

IV.

A MISTAKE

On the same morning, before the dawn appeared, amidst the obscurity of the forest, along the crossroad which goes from Javené to Lécousse, this happened:

All the roads in the Bocage are between high banks, and, of all the roads, that leading from Javené to Parigné by the way of Lécousse is the most deeply sunken. Besides that, it is winding. It is a ravine rather than a road. This road comes from Vitré, and had the honor of jolting Madame de Sévigné's carriage. It is shut in on the right and left by hedges. There could be no better place for an ambush.

On this morning, an hour before Michelle Fléchard, coming from another point of the forest, reached the first village where she had seen the sepulchral apparition of the wagon escorted by gendarmes, a crowd of invisible men filled the copses where the Javené road crosses the bridge over the Couesnon. The branches hid them. These men were peasants, all wearing jackets of skins such as the kings of Brittany wore in the sixteenth century and the peasants in the eighteenth. The men were armed, some with guns, others with axes. Those who carried axes had just prepared in an open space a sort of pyre of dried fagots and billets which was ready to set on fire. Those who had guns were stationed on the two sides of the road. Could anyone have looked through the leaves they would have everywhere seen fingers on triggers and guns aimed toward the openings left by the interlacing branches. These men were on the watch. All the guns pointed toward the road, which the first gleams of day had begun to light up.

In this twilight whispers were heard.

"Are you sure of that?"

"Well, they say so."

"She is about to pass?"

"They say she is in the neighborhood."

"She must not go out."

"She must be burned."

"We are three villages who have come out for that."

"Yes, but the escort?"

"The escort will be killed."

"But will she pass by this road?"

"They say so."

"Then she comes from Vitré?"

"Why not?"

"But somebody said she was coming from Fougères."

"Whether she comes from Fougères or from Vitré, she comes from the devil."

"Yes."

"And must go back to him."

"Yes."

"So she is going to Parigné?"

"It appears so."

"She will not go."

"No."

"No, no, no!"

"Attention."

It became prudent now to be silent, for the day was breaking.

Suddenly these ambushed men held their breath; they caught a sound of wheels and horses. They peered through the branches and could perceive indistinctly on the high banked road a long wagon, an escort on horseback, and something on the wagon; it was coming toward them.

"There she is," said one who appeared to be the leader.

"Yes," said one of the scouts, "with the escort."

"How many men?"

"Twelve."

"We were told they were twenty."

"Twelve or twenty, kill all."

"Wait till they get within range."

A little later, the wagon and its escort appeared at a turn in the road.

"Long live the king!" cried the chief peasant.

A hundred guns were fired at the same instant.

When the smoke cleared away, the escort was also cleared away. Seven horsemen had fallen, five had fled. The peasants rushed up to the wagon.

"Hold," cried the chief, "this is not the guillotine. It is a ladder."

A long ladder was, in fact, all the wagon carried.

The two horses had fallen wounded; the driver had been killed, but not intentionally.

"All the same," said the chief, "a ladder with an escort looks suspicious. It was going toward Parigné. It was for the attack on La Tourgue, that's sure."

"Let us burn the ladder!" cried the peasants.

And they burned the ladder.

As for the funereal wagon for which they had been waiting, it was going by another road, and was already two leagues off, in the village where Michelle Fléchard saw it pass at sunrise.

V.

VOX IN DESERTO

When Michelle Fléchard left the three children to whom she had given her bread, she took her way at random through the wood.

Since nobody would point out the road, she must find it out for herself. Now and then she sat down, then rose, then reseated herself again. She was borne down by that terrible fatigue which first attacks the muscles, then passes into the bones; weariness like that of a slave. She was in reality a slave. The slave of her lost children. She must find them. Each instant that elapsed might be to their hurt; whosoever has a duty like this woman's has no rights; it is forbidden even to stop to take breath. But she was very tired. In the extreme of exhaustion which she had reached, another step becomes a question. Can one make it? She had walked since morning, finding no other village, not even a house. She took first the right path, then the wrong one, and ended by losing herself amid the by-paths which closely resembled one another. Was she approaching her goal? was she nearing the end of her Passion? She was in the Via Dolorosa, and she felt the crushing weariness of the last station. Was she about to fall in the road and die there? There came a moment when to advance farther seemed impossible to her, the sun was setting, the forest was growing dark, the paths were hidden beneath the grass, and she was helpless. She had nothing left but God. She began to call, no voice answered.

She looked about, she perceived an opening in the branches, turned in that direction, and found herself suddenly on the edge of the wood.

She had before her a valley, narrow as a ditch, at the bottom of which a clear stream ran over the stones. She then felt that she was burning with thirst. She went down to the stream, knelt by it, and drank.

She took advantage of her kneeling position to say her prayers.

When she rose she tried to decide upon a course.

She crossed the brook.

Beyond the little valley stretched, as far as the eye could reach, a plateau covered with underbrush, which, starting from the brook, ascended in an inclined plane, and filled the whole horizon. The forest had been deserted, this plain was a desert. Behind every bush of the forest she might meet some one; on the plateau, as far as she could see, nothing met her gaze. A few birds, which seemed frightened, were flying away over the heath.

Then, in the midst of this awful abandonment, feeling her knees give way under her, and as if gone suddenly mad, the distracted mother flung forth this strange cry into the silence: "Is there any one here?"

And she waited for an answer.

It came.

A low, deep voice burst forth; it came from the edge of the horizon, and was borne forward from echo to echo; it was either a peal of thunder or a cannon, and it seemed as if the voice replied to the mother's question and that it said, "Yes."

Then all was silent.

The mother rose, animated with fresh life; there was some one; it seemed to her as if she had now some person with whom she could speak; she had drunk and prayed; her strength came back; she began to cross the plain in the direction whence she had heard that vast and far-off voice.

Suddenly she saw a lofty tower start up on the extreme edge of the horizon. This tower was the only object visible in the savage landscape; a ray from the setting sun reddened it. It was more than a league away. Behind the tower spread out a great sweep of trees which lost itself in the mist, it was the forest of Fougères.

This tower appeared to her to be the point whence came the thundering which had seemed to her like a summons. Was it that which had given the answer to her cry?

Michelle Fléchard reached the top of the plateau; she had nothing but the plain before her.

She walked toward the tower.

VI.

THE SITUATION

The moment had come.

The inexorable held the pitiless.

Cimourdain had Lantenac in his hand.

The old royalist rebel was caught in a trap; it was evident that he could not escape; and Cimourdain meant that the marquis should be beheaded here, upon his own territory, on this very spot, and, as it were, in his own castle; that the feudal stronghold might see fall the head of the feudal lord and the example thus be made memorable.

It was with this intention that he had sent to Fougères for the guillotine. We have just seen it on the way.

To kill Lantenac was to slay the Vendée; to slay the Vendée was to save France. Cimourdain did not hesitate. The conscience of this man was quiet, he was urged to ferocity by a sense of duty.

The marquis seemed lost; in regard to that Cimourdain was at ease, but there was one thing which troubled him. The struggle must inevitably be a terrible one; Gauvain would direct it, and perhaps would wish to take part in it; this young chief was a soldier at heart; he was just the man to fling himself into the thick of the fight; what if he should be killed? Gauvain! his child! the only affection he possessed on earth! Thus far fortune had favored Gauvain, but fortune might grow weary. Cimourdain trembled. His strange destiny had placed him here between these two Gauvains, for one of whom he wished death, for the other life.

The cannon-shot which had roused Georgette in her cradle and summoned the mother from the depths of her solitude had done more than that. Either by accident, or owing to the intention of the man who fired the piece, the ball, although only meant as a warning, had struck, broken, and half wrenched away the guard of iron bars which protected the great loop-hole of the first floor of the tower. The besieged had not had time to repair this damage.

The besieged had been boastful; they had very little ammunition. Their situation, indeed, was much more critical than the besiegers supposed. If they had had powder enough they would have blown up La Tourgue, themselves, and the enemy together in it; this had been their dream ; but their reserves were exhausted. They had not more than thirty charges left for each man. They had plenty of guns, blunderbusses, and pistols, but few cartridges. They had loaded all the weapons in order to keep up a steady fire ; but how long could this steady firing last ? They must lavishly exhaust the resources which they required to husband. That was the difficulty. Fortunately—terrible fortune—the struggle would be mostly man to man, and hand to hand ; with sabre and poniard. The conflict would be a duel with knives ; this was the hope of the besieged.

The interior of the tower seemed impregnable. In the lower hall, which the mine had breached, was the retirade, that barricade so skillfully constructed by Lantenac, which guarded the entrance. Behind the retirade, a long table covered with loaded weapons, blunderbusses, carbines, and muskets, sabres, axes, and poniards. Since they had no powder to blow up the tower, the crypt of the oublilettes could not be utilized, therefore the marquis had closed the door of the dungeon. Above the ground-floor hall was the round chamber which could only be reached by the narrow, Saint-Gilles' staircase ; this chamber, in which there also set a table covered with loaded weapons ready at hand, was lighted by the great loop-hole, the grating of which had just been broken by the cannon-ball; from this chamber the spiral staircase ascended to the circular room on the second floor, in which was the iron door communicating with the bridge-castle. This chamber was called either the room with the iron door, or the room with the mirrors, from numerous small looking-glasses hung to rusty old nails on the naked stones of the wall, a fantastic mingling of elegance and savage desolation. Since the apartments on the upper floor could not be successfully defended, this mirror-room became what Manesson-Mallet, the authority on fortified places, calls "the last post where the besieged capitulate." The struggle, as we have already said, would be to keep the assailants from reaching this room.

This second-floor round chamber was lighted by loop-holes; still a torch burned there. This torch, in an iron holder like the one in the hall below, had been kindled by Imânus, and the end of the sulphur-match had been placed near it. Horrible thoughtfulness.

At the end of the ground-floor hall was a board placed upon trestles, which held food, like the arrangement in a Homeric cavern; great dishes of rice, a porridge of black grain, hashed veal, biscuits, stewed fruit, and jugs of cider. Whosoever wished could eat and drink.

The cannon-shot set them all on the watch. Not more than a half-hour of quiet remained to them.

From the top of the tower Imânus watched the approach of the besiegers. Lantenac had ordered his men not to fire but to let the assailants come in. He had said:

"They are four thousand five hundred. To kill outside is useless. Kill only those inside. Inside the chances are more equal."

Then he laughed, and added: "Equality, Fraternity."

It had been agreed that when the enemy began to advance, Imânus should sound a warning on his horn.

The little troop, posted behind the retirade or on the stairs, waited with one hand on their muskets, the other on their rosaries.

The situation had resolved itself into this.

For the assailants, a breach to mount, a barricade to force, three rooms, one above the other, to take by main strength, one after the other, two winding staircases to be carried step by step under a storm of bullets; for the besieged, to die.

VII.

PRELIMINARIES

Gauvain on his side arranged the order of attack. He gave his last instructions to Cimourdain, whose part in the action, it will be remembered, was to guard the plateau, and to Guéchamp, who was to wait with the main body of the army in the forest camp. It was understood that neither the masked battery in the wood nor the open battery on the plateau would fire unless there should be a sortie or an attempt at escape. Gauvain had reserved for himself the command of the storming column. It was that which troubled Cimourdain.

The sun had just set.

A tower in an open country resembles a ship at sea. It must be attacked in the same manner. It is a boarding rather than an assault. No cannon. Nothing useless is attempted. What would be the good of cannonading walls fifteen feet thick? A porthole, men forcing it on the one side, men guarding it on the other, axes, knives, pistols, fists, and teeth. Such is the undertaking.

Gauvain felt that there was no other way of carrying La Tourgue. Nothing can be more murderous than a conflict so close that the combatants look into one another's eyes. He had lived in this tower when a child and knew its formidable recesses by heart.

He thought deeply.

A few steps from him, his lieutenant, Guéchamp, stood with a spy-glass in his hand, examining the horizon in the direction of Parigné. Suddenly Guéchamp cried:

"Ah! at last!"

This exclamation roused Gauvain from his reverie.

"What is it, Guéchamp?"

"Commandant, the ladder is coming."

"The escape-ladder?"

"Yes."

"What! It has not yet got here?"

"No, commandant. And I was uneasy. The messenger that I sent to Javené came back."

"I know it."

"He told me that he had found at the carpenter's shop in Javené a ladder of the requisite dimensions, which he had put into requisition, and had loaded the ladder on a cart, that he had demanded an escort of twelve horsemen, and that he had seen them set out from Parigné, the cart, the escort, and the ladder. Then he rode back full speed. Such was his report to me. And he added, that the horses being good and the departure having taken place about two o'clock in the morning, the wagon would be here before sunset."

"I know all that. Well?"

"Well, commandant, the sun has just set, and the wagon which brings the ladder has not yet arrived."

"Is it possible? Still we must commence the attack. The time has come. If we were to wait, the besieged would think that we hesitated."

"Commandant, the attack can commence."

"But the escape-ladder is necessary."

"Without doubt."

"But we have not got it."

"We have."

"How?"

"It was that which made me say: 'Ah! at last!' The wagon did not arrive; I took my telescope, and examined the route from Parigné to La Tourgue, and, commandant, I am satisfied, the wagon and the escort are there. They are coming down the hill. You can see them."

Gauvain took the glass and looked.

"Yes; there it is. There is not light enough to distinguish very clearly. But I can see the escort, it is certainly that. Only the escort appears to be more numerous than you said, Guéchamp."

"And to me also."

"They are about a quarter of a league away."

"Commandant, the escape-ladder will be here in a quarter of an hour."

"We can attack."

It was indeed a wagon which they saw coming, but not the one they thought.

As Gauvain turned, he saw Sergeant Radoub standing behind him, upright, his eyes downcast, in the attitude of a military salute.

"What is it, Sergeant Radoub?"

"Citizen commandant, we, the men of the Battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge, have a favor to ask of you."

"What?"

"To have us killed."

"Ah!" said Gauvain.

"Will you have that kindness?"

"But—that is according to circumstances," said Gauvain.

"Listen, commandant. Since the fight at Dol, you are careful of us. We are still twelve."

"Well?"

"That humiliates us."

"You are the reserve."

"We would rather be the advance-guard."

"But I need you to decide success at the close of the engagement. I keep you back for that."

"Too much."

"No. You are in the column. You march."

"In the rear. Paris has a right to march in front."

"I will think of it, Sergeant Radoub."

"Think of it to-day, my commandant. Here is an opportunity. There are going to be hard blows to give and take. It will be lively. La Tourgue will burn the fingers of those that touch her. We ask the favor of being in the attacking party."

The sergeant paused, twisted his moustache, and added, in an altered voice:

"Besides, look you, my commandant, our little ones are in this tower. Our children are there, the children of the battalion, our three children. That false-face of a Gribouille-mon-cul-te-baise called Bris-Bleu and Imânus, this Gouge-le-Bruand, this Bouge-le-Gruand, this Fouge-le-Truand, this thunder-clap of the devil, threatens our children. Our children, our brats, my commandant. If all the earthquakes should mix themselves up in the business, we cannot have any misfortune happen to our children. Do you hear that, my chief? We will not allow it. A little while ago I took advantage of the truce, and mounted the plateau, and looked at them through a window, yes, they are certainly there, you can see them from the edge of the ravine. I did see them, and they were afraid of me, the darlings. My commandant, if a single hair of their little cherub pates should fall, I swear by the thousand names of names of everything sacred, that I, Sergeant Radoub, will have my revenge on the body of the Eternal Father. And this is what all the battalion say: either we want the brats saved, or we want to be all killed. It is our right, by thunder! yes, all killed. And now, salute and respect."

Gauvain held out his hand to Radoub, and said:

"You are brave men. You shall have a place in the attacking column. I will divide you into two parties. I will put six of you in the vanguard to make sure that the troops advance, and six in the rear-guard to make sure that nobody retreats."

"Will I command the twelve, as usual?"

"Certainly."

"Then, my commandant, thanks. For I will be in the vanguard."

Radoub made another military salute and went back to his company.

Gauvain drew out his watch, spoke a few words in Guéchamp's ear, and the storming column began to form.

VIII.

THE WORD AND THE ROAR

Now Cimourdain, who had not yet gone to his post on the plateau, and was still standing near Gauvain, approached a trumpeter.

"Demand a parley," said he.

The trumpet sounded, the horn replied.

Again the trumpet and the horn exchanged a blast.

"What does that mean?" Gauvain asked Guéchamp. "What does Cimourdain want?"

Cimourdain advanced toward the tower, holding a white handkerchief in his hand.

He spoke in a loud voice:

"Men who are in the tower, do you know me?"

A voice, the voice of Imânus, replied from the top of the tower:

"Yes."

The following dialogue between the two voices was heard by those standing near.

"I am the envoy of the Republic."

"You are the former curé of Parigné."

"I am the delegate of the Committee of Public Safety."

"You are a priest."

"I am the representative of the law."

"You are a renegade."

"I am the commissioner of the Revolution."

"You are an apostate."

"I am Cimourdain."

"You are the devil."

"You know me?"

"We curse you."

"Would you be content if you had me in your power?"

"We are here eighteen, who would give our heads to have yours."

"Very well, I come to deliver myself up to you."

From the top of the tower rang a burst of savage laughter, and this cry:

"Come!"

The camp waited in the breathless silence of expectancy.

Cimourdain resumed:

"On one condition."

"What?"

"Listen."

"Speak."

"You hate me?"

"Yes."

"And I love you. I am your brother."

The voice from the top of the tower replied:

"Yes, Cain."

Cimourdain spoke in a peculiar tone, at once loud and sweet:

"Insult me, but listen. I come here under a flag of truce. Yes, you are my brothers. You are poor misguided creatures. I am your friend. I am the light, and I speak to ignorance. Light is always brotherhood. Besides, have we not all the same mother, our country? Well, listen to me. You will know hereafter, or your children will know, or your children's children will know that that which is done on this day is brought about by the law above, and that the Revolution is the work of God. While awaiting the time when all consciences, even yours, shall understand this, when all fanaticisms, even ours, shall vanish, while waiting for this great light to spread, will no one have pity on your darkness? I come to you, I offer you my head; I do more, I hold out my hand to you. I ask of you the favor of destroying me in order to save yourselves. I have unlimited authority, and what I say I can do. This is a supreme moment; I make a last effort. Yes, he who speaks to you is a citizen, and in this citizen, yes, there is a priest. The citizen defies you, but the priest implores you. Listen to me. Many among you have wives and children. I am defending your children and your wives. I am defending them against yourselves. Oh, my brothers . . . "

"Go on, preach!" sneered Imânus. Cimourdain continued:

"My brothers, do not let the terrible horn sound. Throats are to be cut. Many among us who are here before you will not see tomorrow's sun; yes, many of us will perish, and you, you all, are going to die. Show mercy to yourselves. Why shed all this blood, when it is useless? Why kill so many men, when it would suffice to kill two?"

"Two?" repeated Imânus.

"Yes. Two."

"Who?"

"Lantenac and myself."

And Cimourdain spoke more loudly.

"Two men are in the way, Lantenac for us; I for you. This is what I propose to you, and you will all be saved: give us Lantenac, and take me. Lantenac will be guillotined, and you shall do what you choose with me."

"Priest," howled Imânus, "if we had thee, we would roast thee at a slow fire."

"I consent," said Cimourdain.

And he continued:

"You, the condemned who are in this tower, in an hour you can all be alive and free. I bring you safety. Do you accept?"

Imânus burst forth:

"You are not only a villain, you are a madman. Ah! there, why do you come here to disturb us? Who begged you to come and speak to us? We give up monseigneur! What is it you want?"

"His head. And I offer you . . ."

"Your skin. For we would flay you like a dog, Curé Cimourdain. Well, no, your skin is not worth his head. Get away with you."

"The massacre will be horrible. For the last time, reflect."

Night had come during this strange colloquy which could be heard without and within the tower. The Marquis de Lantenac kept silence and allowed events to take their course. Leaders possess such sinister egotism. It is one of the rights of responsibility.

Imânus no longer addressed himself to Cimourdain, he shouted:

"Men who attack us, we have submitted our propositions to you, they are settled, we have nothing to change in them. Accept them, else, woe to all! Do you consent? We will give up the three children, and you will allow liberty and life to us all."

"To all, yes," replied Cimourdain, "except one."

"And that one?"

"Lantenac."

"Monseigneur! Give up monseigneur? Never."

"We must have Lantenac."

"Then begin."

All was silent.

Imânus, after having sounded the signal on his horn, descended; the marquis took his sword in his hand; the nineteen besieged grouped themselves in silence in the lower hall, behind the retirade, and sank upon their knees. They could hear the measured tread of the column as it advanced in the darkness toward the tower; the sound came nearer; suddenly they heard it close to them, at the very mouth of the breach. Then all, kneeling, aimed their guns and blunderbusses across the openings of the barricade, and one of them, Grand-Francœur, who was the priest Turmeau, raised himself, and, with a naked sabre in his right hand and a crucifix in his left, said in a solemn voice:

"In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost!"

All fired at the same time, and the battle began.

IX.

TITANS AGAINST GIANTS

The encounter was frightful.

This hand-to-hand contest went beyond the power of fancy.

To find anything similar it would be necessary to go back to the great duels of Æschylus or the ancient feudal butcheries, to those "attacks with short-arms" which lasted down to the seventeenth century, when men penetrated into fortified places by concealed breaches; tragic assaults, where, says the old sergeant of the province of Alentejo, "when the mines had done their work the besiegers advanced bearing planks covered with sheets of tin, and armed with round shields, and furnished with grenades, they forced those who held the intrenchments, or retirades, to abandon them, and thus became masters, vigorously driving back the besieged."

The place of attack was terrible; it was what in military language is called "a covered breach," that is to say, a crevasse piercing the wall through and through, and not a wide breach open to the day. The powder had acted like an auger. The effect of the explosion had been so violent that the tower was cracked for more than forty feet above the chamber of the mine, but this was only a crack, and the practicable rent which served as a breach and gave admittance into the lower hall, resembled a thrust from a lance, which pierces, rather than a blow from an axe, which gashes.

It was a hole in the flank of the tower, a long cut, something like the mouth of a well, a passage, twisting and mounting like an intestine through the wall fifteen feet in thickness, a mis-shapen cylinder, encumbered with obstacles, traps, stones broken by the explosion, where anyone entering struck his head against the granite rock, his feet against the rubbish, while the darkness blinded him.

The assailants saw before them this black gap, the mouth of a gulf, which had for upper and lower jaws all the stones of the jagged wall; a shark's mouth has not more teeth than had this frightful opening. It was necessary to enter this gap and to get out of it.

Within was the shower of bullets, without rose the retirade. Without, that is to say, in the hall of the ground-floor.

The encounters of sappers in covered galleries when the counter-mine succeeds in cutting the mine, the butcheries on the gun-decks of vessels boarded in a naval engagement, alone have this ferocity. To fight at the bottom of a grave, that is the supreme degree of horror. It is frightful for men to meet in the death-struggle in such narrow bounds. At the moment when the first rush of besiegers entered, the whole retirade blazed, and it was like lightning flashes underground. The thunder of the assailants replied to that of the ambuscade. The detonations answered one another; Gauvain's voice was heard shouting: "Break in!" Then Lantenac's cry: "Hold firm against the enemy!" Then Imânus' yell, "Here, you men of the Main!" Then the clash of sabres against sabres, and echo after echo of terrible discharges that killed right and left. The torch fastened against the wall dimly lighted the horrible scene. It was impossible clearly to distinguish anything; the combatants struggled amidst a lurid night; whoever entered was suddenly struck deaf and blind; deafened by the noise, blinded by the smoke. The combatants trod upon the dead; they lacerated the wounds of the injured men lying helpless amidst the rubbish; stamped recklessly upon limbs already broken; the sufferers uttered fearful groans; the dying fastened their teeth in the feet of their unconscious tormentors. Then for an instant would come a silence more dreadful than the tumult. The foes faced each other; the hissing sound of their breathing could be heard; the gnashing of teeth, death-groans, curses, then the thunder would recommence. A stream of blood flowed out from the tower through the breach and spread away across the darkness. This blood formed smoking pools in the grass.

One might have said that the tower itself had been wounded, and that the giantess was bleeding.

Strange thing, scarcely a sound of the struggle could be heard without. The night was very black, and a sort of funereal calm reigned in plain and forest about the beleaguered fortress. Hell within, the sepulchre without. This shock of men exterminating one another amidst the darkness, these musket volleys, these clamors, these shouts of rage, all that din expired beneath the mass of walls and arches, air was lacking, and suffocation added itself to the carnage. Scarcely a sound reached those outside the tower. The little children slept.

The strife grew more terrible. The retirade held firm. Nothing more difficult than to force a barricade with a re-entering angle. If the besieged had numbers against them, they at least had the position in their favor. The storming-column lost many men. Stretched in a long line outside the tower, it forced its way slowly in through the opening of the breach like a snake wriggling into its hole.

Gauvain, with the natural imprudence of a youthful leader, was in the hall in the thickest of the fight, with the bullets flying in every direction about his head. Besides, he had the assurance of a man who has never been wounded.

As he turned about to give an order, the glare of a volley of musketry lighted up a face close beside him.

"Cimourdain!" cried he "What are you doing here?"

It was indeed Cimourdain. Cimourdain replied:

"I have come to be near you."

"But you will be killed!"

"Very well, but you, what are you doing here, then?"

"I am necessary here; you are not."

"Since you are here, I too must be here."

"No, my master."

"Yes, my child!"

And Cimourdain remained near Gauvain.

The dead lay in heaps on the pavement of the hall.

Although the retirade was not yet carried, numbers would evidently conquer at last. The assailants were sheltered, and the assailed under cover; ten besiegers fell to one among the besieged; but the besiegers were constantly renewed. The assailants increased, and the assailed grew less.

The nineteen besieged were all behind the retirade, because the attack was made there. They had dead and wounded among them. Not more than fifteen could fight now. One of the most furious, Chante-en-hiver, had been horribly mutilated. He was a stubby, woolly-haired Breton, little and active. He had an eye gouged out and his jaw broken. He could still walk. He dragged himself up the spiral staircase, and reached the chamber of the first floor, hoping to be able to say a prayer there and die.

He backed himself up against the wall near the loop-hole in order to breathe a little fresh air.

Beneath, in front of the barricade, the butchery became more and more horrible. In a pause between the answering discharges, Cimourdain raised his voice:

"Besieged!" cried he. "Why shed more blood? You are beaten. Surrender. Remember we are four thousand five hundred men against nineteen, that is to say, more than two hundred to one. Surrender."

"Let us put a stop to those hypocritical babblings," retorted the Marquis de Lantenac.

And twenty balls answered Cimourdain.

The retirade did not reach to the arched roof; this space permitted the besieged to fire upon the barricade, but it also gave the besiegers an opportunity to scale it.

"Assault the retirade!" cried Gauvain. "Is there any man willing to scale the retirade?"

"I!" said Sergeant Radoub.

X.

RADOUB

Then the stupor of astonishment seized the assailants. Radoub had entered the breach at the head of the column, and of those men of the Parisian battalion of which he made the sixth, four had already fallen. After he had uttered that shout: "I!" he was seen to retreat instead of advance, and stooped, bent forward, creeping almost between the legs of the combatants, he regained the opening of the breach, and rushed out. Was it a flight? Would a man like this desert? What did it mean?

When he was outside, Radoub, still blinded by the smoke, rubbed his eyes as if to clear them from the horror and the night, and, by the light of the stars, he studied the wall of the tower. He nodded his head as if to say: "I was not mistaken."

Radoub had noticed that the deep crack made by the explosion of the mine extended above the breach to the loop-hole of the upper story whose iron grating had been shattered and broken by a ball. The net-work of broken bars hung loosely down so that a man could enter.

A man could enter, but could a man climb up? By the crevice, yes; provided that he were a cat.

That was what Radoub was. He belonged to the race which Pindar calls "the agile athletes." One may be an old soldier and a young man; Radoub, who had belonged to the French Guards, was not yet forty. He was a nimble Hercules.

Radoub threw his musket on the ground, took off his shoulder-straps, laid aside his coat and jacket, keeping his two pistols which he thrust in his trowsers'-belt and his naked sabre which he held between his teeth. The butt-ends of the pistols protruded above his belt.

Thus lightened of everything useless, and followed in the darkness by the eyes of all in the attacking column who had not yet entered the breach, he began to climb the stones of the cracked wall as if they had been the steps of a staircase. Having no shoes was an advantage; nothing can cling like a naked foot; he twisted his toes into the holes of the stones. He hoisted himself with his hands, and bore his weight on his knees. The ascent was a hazardous one. It was somewhat like climbing along the teeth of a gigantic saw. "Luckily," thought he, "there is nobody in the chamber of the first story, else I should not be allowed to climb up like this."

He had not more than forty feet left to mount. He was somewhat encumbered by the projecting butt-ends of his pistols, and as he climbed the crevice narrowed, rendering the ascent more and more difficult. The danger of falling increased as he went on.

At last he reached the frame of the loop-hole; he pushed aside the twisted and broken grating, he had space enough to pass through; he raised himself for a last powerful effort, rested his knee on the cornice of the ledge, seized with one hand a bar of the grating at the left, with the other a bar at the right, lifted half his body in front of the embrasure of the loop-hole, and, sabre between his teeth, hung thus by his two hands over the abyss.

It only needed one spring more to land him in the chamber of the first floor.

But a face appeared in the opening.

Radoub saw a frightful spectacle rise suddenly before him in the gloom; an eye torn out, a jaw fractured, a bloody mask.

This mask, which had only one eye left, was watching him.

This mask had two hands; these two hands thrust themselves out of the darkness of this loop-hole and clutched at Radoub; one of them seized the two pistols in his belt, the other snatched the sword from between his teeth.

Radoub was disarmed. His knee slipped upon the inclined plane of the cornice; his two hands, clasped about the bars of the grating, barely sufficed to support him, and beneath was a sheer descent of forty feet.

This mask and these hands belonged to Chante-en-hiver.

Suffocated by the smoke which rose from the room below, Chante-en-hiver had succeeded in entering the embrasure of the loop-hole; the air from without had revived him, the freshness of the night had congealed the blood, and his strength had in a measure come back; suddenly he saw the body of Radoub rise in front of the embrasure; Radoub, having his hands twisted about the bars, had no choice but to let himself fall or allow himself to be disarmed, so Chante-en-hiver, with a horrible tranquillity, had taken the two pistols out of his belt and the sabre from between his teeth.

Then commenced an unheard-of duel, a duel between the disarmed and the wounded.

Evidently the dying man had the victory in his own hands. A single shot would suffice to hurl Radoub into the yawning gulf beneath his feet.

Luckily for Radoub, Chante-en-hiver held both pistols in the same hand, so that he could not fire either, and was forced to make use of the sabre. He struck Radoub a blow on the shoulder with the point. The sabre-stroke wounded Radoub but saved his life.

Radoub was unarmed, but in full possession of his strength, regardless of his wound, which indeed was only a flesh-cut, he swung his body vigorously forward, loosed his hold of the bars and bounded through the loop-hole.

There he found himself face to face with Chante-en-hiver, who had thrown the sabre behind him and was clutching a pistol in either hand.

Chante-en-hiver, who had sunk on his knees, had the pistol close to Radoub as he took aim, but his weakened arm trembled, and he did not fire at once.

Radoub took advantage of this respite to burst out laughing.

"I say, Ugly-face!" cried he, "do you suppose you frighten me with your bloody bullock's jaws? Sapristi, how they have shattered your features!"

Chante-en-hiver took aim.

Radoub continued:

"It is not polite to mention it, but the grape-shot has dotted your mug very neatly. Bellona has disturbed your physiognomy, my poor lad. Come, come, spit out your little pistol-shot, my good fellow."

Chante-en-hiver fired and the ball passed so close to Radoub's head that it carried away part of his ear. His foe raised the second pistol in his other hand, but Radoub did not give him time to take aim.

"It is enough to lose one ear," cried he. "You have wounded me twice. It is my turn now!"

He flung himself on Chante-en-hiver, knocked aside his arm with such force that the pistol went off and the ball struck against the ceiling, seized his enemy's broken jaw in both hands and twisted it about.

Chante-en-hiver uttered a howl of pain and fainted.

Radoub stepped across his body and left him lying in the embrasure of the loop-hole.

"Now that I have announced my ultimatum," said he, "don't you stir again. Lie there, you ugly crawling snake. You are right when you fancy that I am not going to amuse myself massacring you. Crawl about on the ground at your ease, citizen under my foot. Die,—you can't get away from that. In a little while you will learn what nonsense your priest has been telling you. Away with you into the great mystery, peasant."

And he hurried forward into the room.

"One cannot see an inch before one's nose," grumbled he.

Chante-en-hiver began to writhe convulsively upon the floor and utter fresh moans of agony, Radoub turned back.

"Hold your tongue! Do me the favor to shut up, citizen senseless. I cannot trouble myself further with you. I should scorn to make an end of you. Just let me have peace."

Then he thrust his hands into his hair as he stood watching Chante-en-hiver.

"But here, what am I to do now? it is all very fine, but I am disarmed. I had two shots to fire. You have robbed me of them, animal! And with all that, a smoke that would blind a dog!"

Then his hand touched his wounded ear:

"Oh!" said he.

Then he went on:

"You have gained a great deal by confiscating one of my ears! However, I would rather have one less of them than anything else, an ear is only an ornament. You have scratched my shoulder, too, but that is nothing. Die, villager, I forgive you."

He listened. The din from the lower room was frightful. The combat had grown more furious than ever.

"Things are going well down there. How they howl 'Live the king! They die bravely."

His foot struck against the sabre. He picked it up, and said to Chante-en-hiver, who no longer stirred, and who was perhaps dead:

"See here, man of the woods, for what I have to do my sabre may perhaps serve. I will take it out of friendship. But I needed my pistols. May the devil fly away with you, savage! Oh, there, what am I to do? I am no good whatever here."

He advanced into the hall trying to guide his steps in the gloom. Suddenly, in the shadow behind the central pillar, he perceived a long table upon which something faintly gleamed. He touched them. They were blunderbusses, carbines, pistols, a whole row of fire-arms laid out in order and seemingly only waiting to be grasped by him; it was the reserve of weapons the besieged had provided in this chamber for their second stand; a whole arsenal.

"A buffet!" cried Radoub.

And he clutched them right and left, overwhelmed with joy.

Thus he became formidable.

He could see back of the table the door of the staircase which communicated with the rooms above and below, standing wide open. Radoub dropped his sabre, seized two double-barreled pistols, and fired them at random through the door-way, then he snatched a blunderbuss and fired that, then a sort of small swivel-gun loaded with buckshot and discharged it. The gun vomiting forth its fifteen balls, sounded like a volley of grape-shot. Then Radoub, having recovered his breath, shouted down the staircase, in a voice of thunder: "Long live Paris!"

Then, seizing a second blunderbuss still bigger than the first, he aimed it toward the winding Saint-Gilles' staircase, and waited.

The confusion in the lower hall was indescribable. This unexpected attack from behind paralyzed the besieged with astonishment.

Two balls from Radoub's triple fire had taken effect; one had killed the elder of the brothers Pique-en-Bois, the other had killed M. de Quélen, nicknamed Houzard.

"They are on the floor above!" cried the marquis.

At this cry the men abandoned the retirade, a flock of birds could not have fled more quickly, and they plunged madly toward the staircase. The marquis encouraged the flight.

"Quick, quick!" exclaimed he. "There is most courage now in escape. Get up to the second floor! We will begin again there."

He left the retirade the last.

This brave act saved his life.

Radoub, ambushed on the second floor at the top of the stairs, watched the retreat, finger on trigger. Those who appeared first at the turn of the spiral steps received the discharge of his gun full in their faces, and fell. Had the marquis been among them, he would have been killed. Before Radoub had time to seize another weapon, the others passed him, the marquis behind all the rest, and moving more slowly. Believing the first-floor chambers filled with the besiegers, the men did not pause there, but rushed on and gained the room above, which was the hall of the mirrors. There was the iron door, there was the sulphur-match, it was there they must surrender or die.

Gauvain, as much astounded as the besieged by the firing from the staircase and unable to understand how aid could have reached him in that quarter, had taken advantage without trying to understand, had leaped over the retirade, followed by his men, and had pursued the fugitives up to the first floor.

There he found Radoub.

The sergeant saluted, and said:

"One minute, my commandant. I did that. I remembered Dol. I followed your plan. I took the enemy between two fires."

"A good scholar," answered Gauvain, with a smile.

After one has been a certain length of time in the darkness, the eyes become accustomed to it like those of a night-bird; Gauvain perceived that Radoub was covered with blood.

"But you are wounded, comrade!"

"Never mind that, my commandant. What difference does it make, an ear more or less? I got a sabre thrust, too, but it is nothing. One always cuts one's self a little in breaking a window. It is only losing a little blood."

The besiegers made a halt in the first-floor chamber, which had been conquered by Radoub. A lantern was brought. Cimourdain rejoined Gauvain. They held a council. It was indeed time to reflect. The besiegers were not in the secrets of their foes; they were unaware of the lack of munitions; they did not know that the defenders of the tower were short of powder; that the second floor must be the last post where a stand could be made; the assailants did not know but that the staircase was mined.

One thing was certain, the enemy could not escape. Those who had not been killed were as safe as if under lock and key. Lantenac was in the trap.

Certain of this, the besiegers could afford to give themselves time to choose the best means of bringing about the end. Many of them had already been killed. The thing now was to spare the men as much as possible in this last assault.

The risk of this final attack would be great. The first fire would without doubt be a hot one.

The fight was interrupted. The besiegers, masters of the ground and first floors, awaited the orders of the commander-in-chief to renew the conflict. Gauvain and Cimourdain were holding counsel. Radoub assisted in silence at their deliberation.

At length he timidly hazarded another military salute.

"My commandant!"

"What is it, Radoub?"

"Have I a right to a little recompense?"

"Yes, indeed. Ask what you like."

"I ask permission to be the first to mount."

It was impossible to refuse him. Indeed, he would have done it without permission.

XI.

DESPERATE MEN

While this consultation took place on the first floor, the besieged were barricading the second. Success is a fury, defeat is a madness. The encounter between the foes would be frenzied. To be close to victory intoxicates. The men below were inspired by hope, which would be the most powerful of human incentives if despair did not exist.

Despair was above.

A calm, cold, sinister despair.

When the besiegers reached the hall of refuge, beyond which they had no resource, no hope, their first care had been to bar the entrance. To lock the door was useless, it was necessary to block the staircase. In a position like theirs, an obstacle across which they could see, and over which they could fight, was worth more than a closed door.

The torch which Imânus had placed in the holder fixed in the wall near the sulphur-match lighted the room.

There was in the chamber one of those great, heavy oak chests which were used to hold clothes and linen before the invention of chests of drawers.

They dragged out this chest and stood it on end in the door-way of the staircase. It fitted solidly and closed the entrance, leaving open at the top only a narrow space through which a man could pass, an excellent mode of killing the enemy one at a time. It was scarcely probable that the assailants would run the risk of trying to pass.

This obstruction of the entrance afforded them a respite.

They numbered their company.

Out of the nineteen, only seven remained, of whom Imânus was one. With the exception of Imânus and the marquis, they were all wounded.

The five wounded men, active still, for in the heat of combat any wound less than mortal leaves a man able to move about; were Châtenay, called Robi; Guinoiseau, Hoisnard Branche-d'Or, Brin-d'Amour, and Grand-Francœur. All the others were dead.

They had no ammunition left. The cartridge-boxes were almost empty. They counted the cartridges. How many shots were there left for the seven to fire? Four.

They had reached the place where nothing remained but to fall. They had retreated to the precipice, yawning and terrible. They stood upon the very edge.

Still the attack was about to recommence, but slowly and on that account all the more surely. They could hear the butt-end of the muskets sound along the staircase step by step, as the besiegers advanced.

No means of escape. By the library? On the plateau bristled six cannon, with every match lighted. By the upper chambers? To what end? They must stop at the platform. The only resource when that was reached would be to fling themselves from the top of the tower.

The seven survivors of this Homeric band found themselves inexorably inclosed and held fast by that thick wall which at once protected and betrayed them. They were not yet taken; but they were already prisoners.

The marquis spoke:

"My friends, all is finished."

Then, after a silence, he added: "Grand-Francœur, become again the Abbé Turmeau."

All knelt, rosary in hand. The measured stroke of the muskets sounded nearer.

Grand-Francœur, covered with blood from a wound made by a ball which had grazed his skull and torn away his leather cap, raised the crucifix in his right hand. The marquis, a skeptic at heart, bent his knee to the ground.

"Let each one," said Grand-Francœur, "confess his faults aloud. Monseigneur, speak."

The marquis answered:

"I have killed."

"I have killed," said Hoisnard.

"I have killed," said Guinoiseau.

"I have killed," said Brin-d'Amour.

"I have killed," said Châtenay.

"I have killed," said Imânus.

And Grand-Francœur replied:

"In the name of the most Holy Trinity I absolve you. May your souls depart in peace."

"Amen," replied all the voices.

The marquis raised himself.

"Now," said he, "let us die."

"And kill," added Imânus.

The blows from the butt-end of the besiegers' muskets began to shake the chest which barred the door.

"Think of God," said the priest; "earth no longer exists for you."

"It is true," replied the marquis; "we are in the tomb."

All bowed their heads and crossed their breasts. The marquis and the priest alone were standing. With eyes cast down the priest prayed, the peasants prayed, the marquis reflected. The chest, as if under the stroke of hammers, echoed dismally.

At this instant a strong, hearty voice sounded suddenly behind them, exclaiming:

"Did I not tell you so, monseigneur?"

All turned their heads in stupefied wonder.

A hole had just opened in the wall.

A stone, perfectly fitted into the others, but not cemented, and having a pivot above and a pivot below, had just revolved like a turnstile, leaving the wall open. The stone having revolved on its axis, the opening was double, and offered two means of exit, one to the right and one to the left, narrow, but leaving space enough to allow a man to pass. Beyond this door, so unexpectedly opened, could be seen the first steps of a spiral staircase. A face appeared in the opening. The marquis recognized Halmalo.

XII.

A SAVIOR

"It is you, Halmalo!"

"It is I, monseigneur. You see that there are stones that turn, that they really exist, and that you can get out of here. I am just in time, but come quickly. In ten minutes you will be in the heart of the forest."

"God is great," said the priest.

"Save yourself, monseigneur," cried the men in concert.

"All of you go first," said the marquis.

"You must go first, monseigneur," answered the Abbé Turmeau.

"I go last."

And the marquis added, in a severe tone:

"No generous disputes. We have no time to be magnanimous. You are wounded. I order you to live and to fly. Quick! and take advantage of this outlet. Thank you, Halmalo."

"Marquis, must we separate?" asked the Abbé Turmeau.

"Below; certainly. We can only escape one by one."

"Does monseigneur appoint a rendez-vous?"

"Yes. A clearing in the forest. La Pierre-Gauvaine. Do you know the place?"

"We all know it."

"I shall be there to-morrow at noon. Let all those who can walk meet me at that time."

"Every man will be there."

"And we will begin the war anew," said the marquis.

In the meantime, Halmalo, pushing against the turning-stone, found that it did not stir. The opening could not be closed again.

"Monseigneur," said he, "we must hurry. The stone will not move. I was able to open the passage, but I cannot shut it."

The stone, in fact, from long disuse, had become hardened, as it were, on its pivots. It was impossible to make it revolve back into its place.

"Monseigneur," continued Halmalo, "I had hoped to close the passage, so that the Blues, when they got in and found no one, and not understanding, would think that you had flown off in the smoke. But the stone will not move. The enemy will see the outlet open and can follow. At least, do not let us lose a minute. Quick, everybody make for the staircase."

Imânus laid his hand on Halmalo's shoulder.

"Comrade, how much time will it take to get from here to the forest and to safety?"

"Is there any one seriously wounded?" asked Halmalo.

They answered: "Nobody."

"In that case, a quarter of an hour will be enough."

"Go," said Imânus; "if the enemy can be kept out of here for a quarter of an hour . . ."

"They may follow, they cannot overtake us."

"But," said the marquis, "they will be here in five minutes, that old chest cannot hold out against them any longer. A few blows from their muskets will end the business. A quarter of an hour! Who can keep them back for a quarter of an hour?"

"I," said Imânus.

"You, Gouge-le-Bruant?"

"I, monseigneur. Listen. Five out of six of you are wounded. I have not a scratch."

"Nor I," said the marquis.

"You are the chief, monseigneur. I am a soldier. Chief and soldier are two different people."

"I know we have each a different duty."

"No, monseigneur, we have, you and I, the same duty, it is to save you."

Imânus turned toward his companions.

"Comrades, the thing necessary to be done is to hold the enemy in check and delay the pursuit as long as possible. Listen. I am in possession of my full strength; I have not lost a drop of blood; not being wounded, I can hold out longer than any of the others. Fly, all of you. Leave me your weapons. I will make good use of them. I take it on myself to stop the enemy for a good half-hour. How many loaded pistols are there?"

"Four."

"Lay them on the floor."

His command was obeyed.

"It is well. I stay here. They will find somebody to talk with. Now, quick, get away."

Life and death hung in the balance; there was no time for thanks, scarcely time for those nearest to grasp his hand.

"We shall meet soon," said the marquis to him.

"No, monseigneur. I hope not. Not soon; for I am going to die."

They got through the opening one after another and passed down the stairs, the wounded going first. While the men were escaping, the marquis took a pencil out of a note-book which he carried in his pocket and wrote a few words on the stone, which, remaining motionless, left the passage gaping open.

"Come, monseigneur, they are all gone but you," said Halmalo.

And the sailor began to descend the stairs. The marquis followed.

Imânus remained alone.

XIII.

THE EXECUTIONER

The four loaded pistols had been laid on the flags, for this chamber had no wooden flooring. Imânus grasped a pistol in either hand.

He moved obliquely toward the entrance to the staircase which the chest obstructed and masked.

The besiegers evidently feared some surprise, one of those final explosions which involve conqueror and conquered in the same ruin. This last attack was as slow and prudent as the first had been impetuous. They had perhaps not wished to push the chest backward into the chamber; they had broken the bottom with blows from their muskets, and pierced the top with bayonet holes, and through these holes they were trying to see into the hall before venturing to enter.

The light from the lanterns with which they had lighted up the staircase shone through these holes.

Imânus saw an eye looking at him through one of the holes. He quickly aimed his pistol at the place and pulled the trigger. To his joy, a horrible cry followed the report. The ball had entered the eye and passed through the brain of the soldier, who fell backward down the stairs.

The assailants had broken away most of the lower part of the cover, and formed thereby two loop-holes; Imânus took advantage of this, thrust his pistol through one of them and fired at random into the mass of besiegers. The ball must have rebounded, for he heard several cries as if three or four were killed or wounded, and there was a great trampling and tumult as the men fell back.

Imânus threw down the two pistols which he had just fired, and took up the two which still remained; then, with a pistol in either hand he peered out through the holes in the chest.

He was able to see what execution his shots had done.

The assailants had descended the stairs. The men he had shot lay there dying; the twisting of the spiral staircase only allowed him to look down three or four steps.

Imânus waited.

"It is so much time gained," thought he.

Then he saw a man flat on his stomach creeping up the stairs, at the same time the head of another soldier appeared lower down from behind the central pillar of the staircase. Imânus aimed at this head and fired. A cry followed, the soldier fell, and Imânus threw away the empty pistol and changed the loaded one from his left hand to his right.

As he did so he felt a horrible pain, and, in his turn, uttered a yell of agony. A sabre had pierced his entrails. A fist, the fist of the man who had crept up the stairs, had just been thrust through the second hole in the bottom of the chest, and this fist had plunged a sabre into Imânus' body.

The wound was frightful; the abdomen was pierced through and through.

Imânus did not fall. He set his teeth together and muttered: "Good!"

Then, tottering along, he dragged himself to the iron door at the side of which the torch was still burning, he laid his pistol on the stones and seized the torch, and, while with his left hand he held together the terrible wound through which his intestines protruded, with the right he lowered the torch till it touched the sulphur-match.

It caught fire, the wick blazed. Imânus dropping the torch, which lay still burning on the ground, again seized his pistol, and falling forward upon the flags, but still able to move, with what breath he had left he blew the wick.

The flame ran along it, passed beneath the iron door, and reached the bridge-castle.

Then seeing that his execrable deed had succeeded, prouder perhaps of this crime than of the courage he had shown before, this man, who had just proved himself a hero only to sink into an assassin, smiled as he stretched himself out to die.

"They will remember me," muttered he. "I take vengeance on these little ones for the fate of the little one who belongs to us all, the king shut up in the Temple."

XIV.

IMÂNUS ALSO ESCAPES

At this moment there was a great noise, the chest was hurled violently back into the hall, and opened the way for a man who rushed forward, sabre in hand, into the room.

"It is I, Radoub. What are you going to do? It bores me to wait. I have risked it. Any way I have just disemboweled one. Now I attack the whole of you. Whether the rest follow me or don't follow me, here I am. How many are there of you?"

It was indeed Radoub, and he was alone. After the massacre Imânus had caused upon the stairs, Gauvain, fearing some secret mine, had drawn back his men and consulted with Cimourdain.

Radoub standing, sabre in hand, upon the threshold, in the obscurity of the chamber across which the nearly extinguished torch cast a faint gleam, repeated his question:

"I am one. How many are you?"

Hearing nothing, he stepped forward. One of those sudden jets of light which an expiring fire sometimes sends out, and which seem like its dying throes, burst from the torch and lit up the entire chamber.

Radoub caught sight of himself in one of the mirrors hanging against the wall, approached it, examined his bleeding face and wounded ear, and said:

"Horrible mutilation."

Then he turned about, and, to his utter stupefaction, perceived that the hall was empty.

"Nobody here!" exclaimed he. "Not a soul."

Then he saw the revolving stone, the opening, and the staircase.

"Ah! I understand! The key to the fields. Come up, all of you! comrades, come up! they have run away. They have leaked out, dissolved, evaporated, cut their lucky. This old jug of a tower has a crack in it. There's the hole they got out by, the beggars! How is anybody to get the better of Pitt and Coburg while they are able to play tricks like these! The very devil himself came to their rescue! There is nobody here!"

The report of a pistol cut short his words, a ball grazed his elbow and flattened itself against the wall.

"Aha! so there is somebody left. Who was good enough to show me that little politeness?"

"I," answered a voice.

Radoub looked about and caught sight of Imânus in the gloom.

"Ah!" cried he. "I've got one. The others have escaped, but you will not, I promise you."

"Do you think not?" retorted Imânus.

Radoub made a step forward and paused.

"Hey, you lying on the ground there, who are you?"

"I am a man lying on the ground who laughs at you who are standing up."

"What is it you are holding in your right hand?"

"A pistol."

"And in your left hand?"

"My entrails."

"You are my prisoner."

"I defy you."

And Imânus, bending over the burning wick, spent his last breath in stirring the flame, and expired.

A few moments afterwards, Gauvain and Cimourdain, followed by the whole troop of soldiers, were in the hall. They all saw the opening. They searched the corners of the room and explored the staircase; it had a passage at the bottom which led to the ravine. The besieged had escaped. They raised Imânus, he was dead. Gauvain, lantern in hand, examined the stone which had afforded an outlet to the fugitives; he had heard of the turning-stone, but he, too, had always disbelieved the story. While looking at the stone he saw some lines written in pencil; he held the lantern closer and read these words:

"Au revoir, Monsieur le Vicomte.— LANTENAC."

Guéchamp was standing beside Gauvain. Pursuit was utterly useless, the flight was an accomplished fact, the fugitives had the whole country to aid them, thickets, ravines, copses, the inhabitants; doubtless they were already far away; there would be no possibility of discovering them; and the whole forest of Fougères was one immense hiding-place. What was to be done? The whole struggle must begin anew. Gauvain and Guéchamp exchanged conjectures and expressions of disappointment.

Cimourdain listened gravely, but did not utter a word.

"And the ladder, Guéchamp?" said Gauvain.

"Commandant, it has not come."

"But we saw a wagon escorted by gendarmes."

Guéchamp replied:

"It did not bring the ladder."

"What did it bring, then?"

"The guillotine," said Cimourdain.

XV.

NEVER PUT A WATCH AND A KEY IN THE SAME POCKET

The Marquis de Lantenac was not so far away as they believed.

But he was none the less in surety and out of their reach.

He had followed Halmalo.

The staircase by which he and Halmalo had descended, in the wake of the other fugitives, ended in a narrow vaulted passage close to the ravine and the arches of the bridge. This passage ended in a deep natural cut which led into the ravine on one side and into the forest on the other. This cut, completely hidden from all eyes, wound out and in among the impenetrable thickets. It would have been impossible to capture a man there. A fugitive, once arrived at this point, had only to twist away like a snake, and he was beyond pursuit. The opening from the staircase into the secret passage was so completely obstructed by brambles that the builders of the passage had not thought it necessary to close it in any other way.

The marquis had now only to go forward. He was not placed in any difficulty by lack of a disguise. Since coming to Brittany he had not thrown aside his peasant's dress, thinking himself more a lord when wearing it.

He had been forced to take off his sword, the belt of which he had unbuckled and thrown away.

When Halmalo and the marquis passed out of the passage into the cut, the five other men, Guinoiseau, Hoisnard Branche-d'Or, Brin-d'Amour, Châtenay, and the Abbé Turmeau were no longer there.

"They did not take much time to get away," said Halmalo.

"Follow their example," answered the marquis.

"Must I leave monseigneur?"

"Without a doubt. I have already told you so. Each escapes more easily alone. One man passes where two cannot. Together we should attract attention. You would lose my life and I yours."

"Does monseigneur know the district?"

"Yes."

"Monseigneur still wishes the rendezvous at the Pierre-Gauvaine?"

"To-morrow. At noon."

"I shall be there. We shall be there."

Then Halmalo burst out.

"Ah! monseigneur, when I think that we were together in the open sea, that we were alone, that I wanted to kill you, that you were my master, that you could have told me so, and that you did not speak! What a man you are!"

The marquis replied:

"England. There is no other way. In fifteen days the English must be in France."

"I have much to tell monseigneur. I obeyed his orders."

"We will talk of all that to-morrow."

"Till to-morrow, monseigneur."

"By-the-way, are you hungry?"

"Perhaps I am, monseigneur. I was in such a hurry to get here that I am not sure whether I have eaten to-day."

The marquis took a cake of chocolate from his pocket, broke it in half, gave one piece to Halmalo and began to eat the other himself.

"Monseigneur," said Halmalo, "at your right is the ravine, at your left, the forest."

"Very good. Leave me. Go your own way."

Halmalo obeyed. He hurried off through the darkness. For a few instants the marquis could hear the crackling of the underbrush, then all was still. By that time it would have been impossible to track Halmalo. This forest of the Bocage, savage and pathless, was the fugitive's auxiliary. He did not disappear, he vanished. It was this ease in scattering which made our armies hesitate before this ever-retreating Vendée, and before the fugitives formidable even as they fled.

The marquis remained motionless. He was a man who forced himself to feel nothing; but he could not restrain his emotion on breathing this free air after having been so long stifled in blood and carnage. To feel himself completely saved after having seemed so utterly lost; after having seen the grave so close at hand, to be swept so suddenly beyond its reach; to come out of death back into life; even to a man like Lantenac, it was a shock; and, familiar as he was with danger, in spite of all the vicissitudes he had passed through, he could not at first steady his soul under this. He acknowledged to himself that he was satisfied. He quickly subdued this emotion which closely resembled joy.

He drew out his watch and struck the hour. What time was it?

To his great astonishment, he found that it was only ten o'clock. When one has just passed through some terrible convulsion of existence in which every hope and life itself were at stake, one is always astounded to find that those awful minutes were no longer than ordinary ones. The warning cannon had been fired a little before sunset, and La Tourgue attacked by the storming-party half an hour later, between seven and eight o'clock, just as night was falling. Thus the colossal combat, begun at eight o'clock, had ended at ten. This whole epic had only taken a hundred and twenty minutes to enact. Sometimes catastrophes sweep on with the rapidity of lightning. The climax is overwhelming from its suddenness.

On reflection, the astonishing thing was that the struggle could have lasted so long; a resistance for two hours of so small a number against so large a force was extraordinary, and certainly it had not been short nor quickly finished, this battle of nineteen against four thousand.

But it was time that he should be gone, Halmalo must be far away, and the marquis judged that it would not be necessary to wait there longer. He put his watch back into his vest; not into the same pocket, for he discovered that the key of the iron door given him by Imânus was there, and the crystal might be broken against the key; then he moved toward the forest.

As he turned to the left, it seemed to him that a faint gleam of light penetrated the darkness where he stood.

As he walked to the left, it seemed to him that a gleam of light reached even to where he was.

He turned, and, through the underbrush suddenly clear cut against a red background and become visible in their tiniest outlines, he perceived a great light in the ravine. He hurried forward, then stopped, remembering what folly it was to expose himself in that light, no matter what might have happened; after all it did not concern him; he set out in the direction Halmalo had indicated, and walked a little way toward the forest.

Suddenly, deep as he was hidden among the brambles, he heard a terrible cry echo over his head; this cry seemed to proceed from the very edge of the plateau above the ravine. The marquis raised his eyes and stood still.

IN DÆMONE DEUS

I.

FOUND, BUT LOST

At the time that Michelle Fléchard caught sight of the tower, reddened by the setting sun, she was more than a league away. She, who could scarcely take a step, did not hesitate before this league which must be traversed. The woman was weak, but the mother found strength. She had walked on.

The sun had set; the twilight came, then black night; always pressing on, she heard a bell afar off, hidden by the darkness, strike eight o'clock, then nine. The peal probably came from the belfry of Parigné. From time to time she paused to listen to strange sounds like the deadened echo of blows, which might perhaps be the wind in the distance.

She walked straight on, breaking the furze and the sharp heath-stems beneath her bleeding feet. She was guided by a faint light which shone around the distant tower, defining its outlines against the night, and giving a mysterious glow to the tower amidst the surrounding gloom. This light became more distinct when the noise sounded louder, then suddenly faded.

The vast plateau across which Michelle Fléchard hurried was covered with grass and heath; not a house, not a tree appeared; it rose gradually, and, as far as the eye could reach, stretched in a straight hard line against the dark horizon where gleamed a few stars. She had always the tower before her eyes, it was this that kept her strength from failing.

She saw the massive pile grow slowly as she walked on.

The smothered reports and the pale gleams of light starting from the tower were, as we have just said, intermittent; they stopped, then began anew, offering an enigma full of agony to the wretched mother.

Suddenly they ceased; noise and gleams of light both died; there was a moment of complete silence, an ominous tranquillity.

It was just at this moment that Michelle Fléchard reached the edge of the plateau.

She saw at her feet a ravine whose bottom was lost in the misty darkness of the night; a short distance away, on the top of the plateau, an entanglement of wheels, metal, and harness, which was a battery; and, before her, fitfully lit up by the matches of the cannon, an enormous pile which seemed built of shadows blacker than the shadows which surrounded it.

This mass of buildings was composed of a bridge whose arches were lost in the ravine, and of a sort of castle which rose upon the bridge, and both bridge and castle supported by a lofty circular shadow, which was the tower toward which this mother had journeyed from so far.

She could see lights come and go in the loop-holes of the tower, and, from the noise which came from it she divined that it was filled with a crowd of men whose gigantic shadows were flung out on the night.

Near the battery was a camp whose outposts Michelle Fléchard might have perceived, but in the gloom and the underbrush she had as yet not noticed it.

She went close to the edge of the plateau, so near the bridge that it seemed to her she could almost touch it with her hand. The depth of the ravine kept her from reaching it. She could make out in the gloom the three stories of the bridge-castle.

She stood there a long time, for the measures of time were lost to this soul, absorbed in mute contemplation of this gaping ravine and this shadowy edifice. What was this building? What was going on within? Was it

La Tourgue? A strange dizziness seized her; in her confusion she could not tell if this were the goal she had been seeking or the starting-point of a terrible journey. She asked herself why she was there.

She looked, she listened.

Suddenly she could see nothing.

A cloud of smoke swept up between her and the pile she was watching. A sharp report forced her to close her eyes. Scarcely had she done so, when a great light reddened the lids. She looked again.

It was no longer the night she had before her, it was the day; but a fearful day; the day born of fire. She was watching the beginning of a conflagration.

From black the smoke had become scarlet, filled with a mighty flame; this flame appeared, then disappeared, writhing and twisting in serpentine coils.

The flame burst out like a tongue from something which resembled blazing jaws; it was the embrasure of a window filled with fire. This window, covered by iron bars already reddened by the heat, was a casement in the lower story of the bridge-castle. Nothing of the building was visible except this window. The smoke covered all, even the plateau, leaving only the mouth of the ravine black against the vermilion flames.

Michelle Fléchard stared, dumb with wonder. Smoke is a cloud, a cloud is a dream; she could no longer tell what she saw. Ought she to fly? Should she remain? She felt as if she were beyond the world of reality.

A wind swept up and burst the curtain of smoke, and in the opening the frowning bastile, suddenly unmasked, appeared; donjon, bridge, castle, dazzling and horrible, with the magnificent gilding of the fire. Michelle Fléchard, by means of this terrible illumination, could see every detail of the ancient keep.

The lowest story of the bridge-castle was burning.

Above rose the two other stories, still untouched, but as it were supported on a pedestal of flames. From the edge of the plateau, where Michelle Fléchard stood, she could catch indistinct glimpses of the interior between the clouds of smoke and fire. The windows were all open.

Through the great casements of the second story, Michelle Fléchard could see, stretched along the walls, cupboards which looked to her to be full of books, and, before one of the windows, lying on the floor, in the shadow, indistinct and massed together like birds in a nest, a little group, which at times she fancied she saw move.

She stared fixedly in that direction.

What was that little group there in the shadow?

Sometimes it flashed across her mind that those were living forms; but she had fever, she had eaten nothing since morning, she had walked without stopping, she was utterly exhausted, she felt herself giving way to a sort of hallucination which she had still reason enough to struggle against; still her eyes fixed themselves ever more steadily upon that one point, she could not look away from that little heap upon the floor, a mass of inanimate objects, doubtless, that had been left in that room below which the flames roared.

Suddenly the fire, as if animated by a will and purpose, flung downward a tongue of flame toward the great dead ivy which covered the façade at which Michelle Fléchard was staring. It seemed as if the fire had just discovered this outwork of dried branches; a spark darted greedily upon it, and spread upward from twig to twig with the frightful rapidity of a train of powder. In the twinkling of an eye the flame reached the second story. As they rose, the flames lit up the chamber of the first floor. The awful glare threw out in bold relief the three little creatures lying asleep upon the floor.

It was a lovely group, legs and arms interlaced, closed eyes, fair smiling faces.

The mother recognized her children.

She uttered a terrible cry.

That cry of indescribable agony is given only to mothers. No sound is at once so savage and so touching. When a woman utters it, you seem to hear the cry of a she-wolf, when the she-wolf cries thus, you seem to hear the voice of a woman.

This cry of Michelle Fléchard was a howl. Hecuba howled, says Homer.

It was this cry which the Marquis de Lantenac had just heard.

When he heard it he stood still.

The marquis was between the outlet of the passage through which he had been guided by Halmalo and the ravine. Across the brambles which surrounded him he saw the bridge in flames and La Tourgue red with the reflection, and, through the opening which the branches left above his head, he perceived close to the edge of the plateau on the opposite side of the gulf, in front of the burning castle, in the bright light of the conflagration, the haggard, anguish-stricken face of a woman bending over the ravine.

It was this woman who had uttered that cry.

She was no longer Michelle Fléchard, she was a Gorgon. She was appalling in her agony. The peasant woman was transformed into one of the Eumenides. This unknown villager, vulgar, ignorant, unreasoning, had risen suddenly to the epic grandeur of despair. Great sufferings swell the soul to gigantic proportions; this mother was all maternity; whatever sums up humanity becomes superhuman; she stood there, on the edge of that ravine, in front of that conflagration, in the presence of that crime, like a power from beyond the grave; she moaned like a wild beast, but her attitude was that of a goddess; the mouth, which uttered imprecations, was set in a flaming mask. Nothing could have been more despotic than her eyes shooting lightnings through her tears; her look thundered at the conflagration.

The marquis listened. Her voice flung its echoes down upon his head; inarticulate, heart-rending, sobs rather than words.

"Ah, my God, my children! those are my children! Help! fire! fire! fire! Oh, you brigands! Is there no one here? My children are burning up! Ah! how horrible! Georgette! My babies! Gros-Alain, René-Jean! What does it mean? Who put my children there? They are asleep. I am mad! It is impossible. Help!"

In the meanwhile a great bustle and movement was apparent in La Tourgue and upon the plateau. The whole camp rushed to the fire which had just burst forth. The besiegers, after meeting the grape-shot, had now to deal with the conflagration. Gauvain, Cimourdain, and Guéchamp were giving orders. What was to be done? Only a few buckets of water could be drained from the half-dried brook of the ravine. The consternation increased. The whole edge of the plateau was covered with men who with anxious eyes watched the progress of the flames.

What they saw was terrible.

They looked, and could do nothing.

The flames, having spread along the ivy, reached the topmost story. There they had found the granary filled with straw and had leaped greedily upon it. The entire granary was burning now. The flames wreathed and danced; the joy of the flames is a terrible joy. It seemed as if a cruel breeze fanned this wood pile. One could fancy that Imânus was there, changed into a cloud of sparks, returned to earth as the murderous spirit of the fire, and that this evil soul was urging on the conflagration. The library was not yet on fire; the height of its ceiling and the thickness of the walls delayed the fatal moment, but it was fast approaching; the flames from below licked the stones, the flames from above caressed them. The awful kiss of death was upon its lips. Beneath, a cave of lava, above an arch of embers; if the floor fell first, the children would be flung into the lava stream; if the ceiling gave way, they would be buried beneath burning coals. René-Jean, Gros-Alain and Georgette still slept, they slept the deep and innocent sleep of childhood, and, across the sheets of flame and smoke which now hid, now exposed the casements, they could be seen in that fiery grotto, within that meteoric glare, peaceful, lovely, motionless, like three confiding cherubs slumbering in a hell; a tiger might have wept to see those angels in that furnace and those cradles in that tomb.

All the while the mother stood there wringing her hands.

"Fire! I say fire! are they all deaf, that nobody comes? they are burning my children! Come, come, you men that I see yonder. Oh, the days and days that I have hunted, and this is where I find them! Fire! help! Three angels! to think of three angels burning there! What had they done, the innocents? they shot me, they are burning my little ones! who is it does such things? Help! save my children! do you not hear me? a dog,—they would have pity on a dog! My children, my children! they are asleep! Oh! Georgette! I see her little angel legs!

René-Jean! Gros-Alain! those are their names. You may know I am their mother. Oh, it is horrible! I have walked days and nights! Why, this very morning I talked of them with a woman! Help! help! fire! Where are those monsters? It is horrible! The eldest not five years old, the youngest not two. I can see their little bare feet. They are asleep, Holy Virgin! Heaven gave them to me, and devils snatch them away. To think how far I have walked! My children, that I nourished with my milk! I, who thought myself wretched because I could not find them! Have pity on me! I want my children, I must have my children! And there they are in the fire! See, how my poor feet bleed! Help! It is not possible that there are men on earth and that they will leave my little ones to die like this! Help! Murder! Oh, such a thing was never seen! Oh, assassins! what is that dreadful house there? They stole my children from me to kill them. God of mercy, give me my children! Oh, I do not know what I shall do! They shall not die! Help, help, help! Oh! if they die like that, I will kill God!"

While the mother's awful supplications rang out, other voices rose upon the plateau and in the ravine:

"A ladder!"

"There is no ladder!"

"Water!"

"There is no water!"

"Up yonder, in the tower, on the second story, there is a door."

"It is iron."

"Break it in!"

"Impossible!"

And the mother, redoubling her agonized appeals:

"Fire! help! Hurry, I say, if you will not kill me! My children! my children! Oh! the horrible fire! take them out of it, or throw me in!"

In the interval between these clamors the triumphant crackling of the flames could be heard.

The marquis put his hand in his pocket and touched the key of the iron door. Then, stooping again beneath the vault through which he had escaped, he turned back into the passage from whence he had just come.

II.

FROM THE DOOR OF STONE TO THE DOOR OF IRON

A whole army distracted by the impossibility of giving aid, four thousand men unable to save three children; such was the situation.

Not even a ladder to be had; the ladder sent from Javenê had not arrived; the impossibility of rescue became more apparent, like a crater that opens; to attempt the staying of the fire by means of the half-dried brook would have been mad folly, like flinging a glass of water on a volcano.

Cimourdain, Guéchamp and Radoub had descended into the ravine; Gauvain returned to the room in the second story of the tower, in which were the stone that turned, the secret passage, and the iron door leading into the library. It was there that the sulphur-match had been lighted by Imânus; it was from there that the conflagration had been started.

Gauvain took with him twenty sappers. There was no possible resource except to break open the iron door. Its fastenings were very secure.

They began by blows with axes. The axes broke. A sapper said :

"Steel snaps like glass against that iron."

The door was made of double sheets of wrought iron, bolted together, each sheet three fingers in thickness.

They took iron bars and tried to shake the door beneath their blows. The bars broke.

"Like matches!" said one of the sappers.

Gauvain gloomily murmured :

"Nothing but a ball could open that door. If we could only get a cannon up here."

"But how to do it!" answered the sapper.

They stood there, defeated. Those powerless arms ceased their efforts. Mute, conquered, dismayed, these men stood staring at the immovable door. A red reflection crept from beneath it. Behind, a conflagration was each instant increasing.

The frightful corpse of Imânus lay on the floor, a demoniac victor.

Only a few moments more, and the whole bridge-castle might fall in.

What could be done? There was not a hope left.

Gauvain, with his eyes fixed on the turning-stone and the secret passage, cried furiously :

"It was by that the Marquis de Lantenac escaped."

"And returns," said a voice.

And the face of a white-haired man appeared in the stone frame of the secret opening.

It was the marquis.

Many years had passed since Gauvain had seen that face so near. He recoiled.

The rest stood there petrified with astonishment.

The marquis held in his hand a large key, he cast a haughty glance upon the sappers standing before him, walked straight to the iron door, bent beneath the arch, and put the key in the lock. The lock creaked; the door opened, they saw a gulf of flame. The marquis entered it.

He entered with a firm step, his head erect.

All followed him with their eyes, amazed.

Scarcely had the marquis moved half a dozen paces down the blazing hall when the floor, undermined by the fire and shaken by his step, gave way beneath his feet and opened a precipice between him and the door. The marquis did not turn his head and walked steadily on. He disappeared in the smoke.

Nothing more could be seen.

Had he been able to advance farther? Had a new slough of fire opened beneath his feet? Had he only succeeded in destroying himself? They could not tell. They had before them only a wall of smoke and flame. The marquis was beyond that, living or dead.

III.

IN WHICH WE SEE THE AWAKENING OF THE CHILDREN WHOM WE HAVE SEEN SLEEPING

The little ones opened their eyes at last.

The fire, which had not yet entered the library, cast a rosy glow across the ceiling. The children had never seen an aurora like that. They watched it. Georgette was in ecstasies.

The conflagration unfurled all its splendors; the black hydra and the scarlet dragon appeared amidst the wreathing smoke in awful darkness and gorgeous vermilion. Long streaks of flame shot far out and illuminated the shadows, like opposing comets pursuing one another. The fire is a prodigal; its furnaces are filled with gems which it flings to the winds; it is not for nothing that charcoal is identical with the diamond. Fissures had opened in the wall of the upper story, through which the embers poured like cascades of jewels; the heaps of straw and grain burning in the granary began to stream out of the windows in an avalanche of golden rain, the grain turning to amethysts and the blades of straw became carbuncles.

"Pretty!" said Georgette.

They all three raised themselves.

"Ah!" cried the mother. "They are awake!"

René-Jean got up, then Gros-Alain, and Georgette followed.

René-Jean stretched his arms, walked toward the window and said: "I am warm."

"Me warm," cooed Georgette.

The mother shrieked: "My children! René! Alain! Georgette!"

The little ones looked about. They strove to comprehend. When men are frightened, children are only curious. He who is easily astonished is difficult to alarm; ignorance is intrepidity. Children have so little claim to purgatory that if they saw it they would admire.

The mother repeated:

"René! Alain! Georgette!"

René-Jean turned his head; that voice roused him from his reverie; children have short memories, but their recollections are swift; the whole past is yesterday to them; René-Jean saw his mother, found that perfectly natural, and, feeling a vague need of support, he called:

"Mamma!"

"Mamma!" said Gros-Alain.

"M'ma!" said Georgette.

And she held out her little arms.

"My children!" shrieked the mother.

All three went close to the window-ledge; fortunately, the fire was not on that side.

"I am too warm," said René-Jean.

He added, "It burns."

Then his eyes sought his mother.

"Come here, mamma!" cried he.

"Tum, m'ma," repeated Georgette.

The mother, with her hair streaming about her face, her garments torn, her feet and hands bleeding, let herself roll from bush to bush down into the ravine. Cimourdain and Guéchamp were there, as powerless below as Gauvain was above. The soldiers, desperate at being able to do nothing, swarmed about. The heat was insupportable, nobody felt it. They looked at the bridge, the height of the arches, the different stories of the castle, the inaccessible windows, and the necessity of immediate action. Three stories to climb. No way of doing it. Radoub, wounded, with a sabre-cut on his shoulder, one ear torn off, and dripping with sweat and blood, rushed forward, he saw Michelle Fléchard—"Hullo!" cried he, "the woman who was shot! so you have come to life again?" "My children!" groaned the mother. "You are right," answered Radoub; "we have no time to occupy ourselves about ghosts." He attempted to climb the bridge, but in vain, he dug his nails in between the stones, he clung there for a few seconds; but the layers were smooth, not a break, not a crack, the wall was as closely joined as if it had been new, and Radoub fell back. The conflagration swept on, each instant growing more terrible; they could see the heads of the three children framed in the red light of the window. In his frenzy Radoub shook his clenched hand at the sky, and shouted: "This is a nice way to do things, good God!" The mother, on her knees, clung to one of the piers of the bridge crying: "Mercy!"

The hollow sound of cracking timbers rose above the roar of the flames. The panes of glass in the bookcases of the library cracked and fell with a crash. It was evident that the timber-work had given way. Human strength could do nothing. Another moment and the whole would fall. They awaited only the final catastrophe. They could hear the little voices repeat: "Mamma! mamma!" All were paralyzed with horror.

Suddenly, at the casement near that where the children stood, a tall form appeared against the crimson background of the flames.

Every head was raised, every eye fixed. A man was up there, a man in the library, in the furnace. The face showed black against the flames, but they could see the white hair. They recognized the Marquis de Lantenac.

He disappeared, then appeared again.

The indomitable old man stood in the window shoving out an enormous ladder. It was the escape-ladder, placed in the library, which he had groped for on the floor and dragged to the window. He held it by one end, and with the marvelous agility of an athlete he slipped it out of the casement and slid it along the wall down into the ravine.

Radoub, overjoyed, folded his arms about the ladder as it descended within his reach, and shouted: "Long live the Republic!"

The marquis replied: "Long live the King!"

Radoub muttered: "You may cry what you like, and talk nonsense if you want to, you are an angel of mercy all the same."

The ladder was settled in place; communication was established between the burning room and the ground; twenty men rushed up, Radoub at their head, and in the twinkling of an eye, they were strung from the top to the bottom, clinging to the rungs like a mason carrying up stones. This formed on the wooden ladder a ladder of flesh. Radoub at the top of the ladder reached the height of the window. He had his face turned toward the fire.

The little army scattered among the heath and along the sides of the ravine pressed forward, overcome by contending emotions, upon the plateau, into the ravine, out on the platform of the tower.

The marquis disappeared again, then reappeared bearing a child in his arms.

There was a tremendous clapping of hands.

The marquis had seized the first little one that he found within reach. It was Gros-Alain.

Gros-Alain cried: "I am afraid."

The marquis gave Gros-Alain to Radoub, Radoub passed him on to the soldier behind, who passed him to another, and just as Gros-Alain, greatly frightened and sobbing loudly, was passed from hand to hand to the bottom of the ladder, the marquis, who had been absent for a moment, returned to the window with René-Jean, who struggled and wept and beat Radoub with his little fists as the marquis passed him to the sergeant.

The marquis went back into the chamber that was now filled with flames. Georgette was there alone. He went up to her. She smiled. This man of granite felt his eyelids grow moist. He asked, "What is your name?"

"Orgette," said she.

He took her in his arms; she was still smiling, and at the instant he handed her to Radoub, that conscience so lofty, and yet so darkened, was dazzled by the beauty of innocence, the old man kissed the child.

"It is the little girl!" said the soldiers; and Georgette in her turn descended from arm to arm till she reached the ground, amidst cries of exultation. They clapped their hands; they leaped; the old grenadiers sobbed, and she smiled at them.

The mother stood at the foot of the ladder breathless, mad, intoxicated by this change, raised, without transition, from hell into paradise. Excess of joy lacerates the heart in its own way. She held out her arms, she received first Gros-Alain, then René-Jean, then Georgette. She frantically covered them with kisses, then burst into a wild laugh and fainted.

A great cry rose:

"They are all saved!"

All were indeed saved, except the old man.

But no one thought of him, perhaps not even he himself.

He remained for a few moments leaning against the window-ledge lost in reverie, as if he wished to leave the gulf of flames time to make a decision. Then, without the least haste, slowly and proudly, he stepped over the window-sill, and, without turning round, erect, upright, his shoulders against the rungs, having the fire at his back, facing the precipice, he began to descend the ladder in silence with the majesty of a phantom. The men who were on the ladder sprang off; every eye-witness shuddered; about this man thus descending from that height there was a sacred horror as about a vision. But he plunged calmly into the darkness before him; as they recoiled, he drew nearer to them; the marble pallor of his face showed no emotion; his haughty eyes were calm and cold; at each step he made toward those men whose wondering eyes gazed upon him out of the darkness, he seemed to tower higher, the ladder shook and echoed under his firm tread, one might have thought him the statue of the commander descending anew into the tomb.

As the marquis reached the bottom, and his foot left the last rung and planted itself on the ground, a hand seized his shoulder. He turned about.

"I arrest you," said Cimourdain.

"I approve of what you do," said Lantenac.

BOOK SIX

IT IS AFTER THE VICTORY THAT THE STRUGGLE TAKES PLACE

I.

LANTENAC TAKEN

The marquis had indeed descended into the tomb.

He was led away.

The crypt-dungeon of the ground-floor of La Tourgue was immediately opened under Cimourdain's lynx-eyed superintendence; a lamp was placed there, a jug of water and a loaf of soldier's bread, a bundle of straw was flung on the ground, and, in less than a quarter of an hour from the time that the priest's hand seized Lantenac the door of the dungeon closed upon him.

This done, Cimourdain went to find Gauvain; at that instant eleven o'clock sounded from the distant church-clock of Parigné; Cimourdain said to Gauvain:

"I am going to hold a court-martial. You will not be of it. You are a Gauvain, and Lantenac is a Gauvain. You are too near a kinsman to be his judge. I blame Égalité for having voted upon Capet's sentence. The court-martial will be composed of three judges; an officer, Captain Guéchamp; a non-commissioned officer, Sergeant Radoub, and myself, I shall preside. Nothing of all this concerns you any longer. We will carry out the decree of the Convention; we will confine ourselves to proving the identity of the ci-devant Marquis de Lantenac. To-morrow the court-martial, the day after to-morrow the guillotine. The Vendée is dead."

Gauvain did not answer a word, and Cimourdain, preoccupied by the final task which remained for him to fulfill, left the young man alone. Cimourdain had to decide upon the hour and choose the place. He had, like Lequinio at Granville, like Tallien at Bordeaux, like Châlier at Lyons, like Saint-Just at Strasbourg, the habit, considered to be a good example, of assisting personally at executions; the judge came to see the headsman do his work; a custom borrowed by the Terror of '93 from the parliaments of France and the Inquisition of Spain.

Gauvain also was preoccupied.

A cold wind moaned up from the forest. Gauvain, leaving Guéchamp to give the necessary orders, went to his tent in the meadow which stretched along the edge of the wood at the foot of La Tourgue, took his hooded cloak and enveloped himself therein. This cloak was bordered with the simple stripe of gold lace which, according to the Republican custom of little ornamentation, designated the commander-in-chief. He began to walk about in this bloody field where the attack had commenced. He was alone there. The fire still continued, but no one any longer paid attention to it; Radoub was beside the children and their mother, almost as maternal as she; the bridge-castle was nearly consumed, the sappers hastened the destruction, they were digging trenches in order to bury the dead, the wounded were being cared for, the retirade had been demolished, the chambers and stairs disencumbered of the dead, they were cleansing the scene of carnage, the soldiers, with true military rapidity, were making what might be called the toilet of the finished battle. Gauvain saw nothing of all this.

So profound was his reverie that he scarcely cast a glance toward the guard about the tower, doubled at the breach by the orders of Cimourdain.

He could distinguish the breach through the obscurity, perhaps two hundred feet away from the corner of the field where he stood. He could see the black opening. It was there the attack had commenced three hours before; it was by this dark gap that he, Gauvain, had penetrated into the tower; there was the ground-floor where the retirade had stood; it was on that same floor that the door of the marquis's prison opened. The guard at the breach watched this dungeon.

While his eyes were absently fixed upon the heath, in his ear rang confusedly, like the echo of a knell, these words: "To-morrow the court-martial, the day after to-morrow the guillotine."

The fire, which had been controlled and upon which the sappers had thrown all the water that could be procured, did not die away without resistance and still cast out intermittent flames; at times the cracking of the ceilings could be heard, and the crash one upon another of the different stories as they fell in a common ruin; then a whirlwind of sparks would fly through the air as if a gigantic torch had been shaken; a glare like lightning illuminated the farthest verge of the horizon, and the shadow of La Tourgue, suddenly growing colossal, spread out to the edge of the forest.

Gauvain walked slowly back and forth in the gloom in front of the breach. At intervals he clasped his hands at the back of his head, covered with his soldier's hood. He was thinking.

II.

GAUVAIN PENSIVE

His reverie was fathomless.

A seemingly impossible change had taken place.

The Marquis de Lantenac had been transfigured.

Gauvain had been a witness of this transfiguration.

He would never have believed that such a state of affairs would arrive from any complication of events, whatever they might be. Never would he have imagined, even in a dream, that anything similar would be possible. The unexpected, that inexplicable power which plays with man at will, had seized Gauvain and held him fast. Gauvain had before him the impossible become a reality, visible, palpable, inevitable, inexorable.

What did he think of it, he, Gauvain?

There was no chance of evasion; the decision must be made.

A question was put to him; he could not avoid it.

Put by whom?

By events.

And not alone by events.

For when events, which are mutable, address a question to us, Justice, which is unchangeable, summons us to reply.

Above the cloud, which casts its shadow upon us, there is the star that sends to us its light.

We can no more escape from the light than from the shadow.

Gauvain was undergoing an interrogatory.

He had been arraigned before a judge.

Before a terrible judge.

His conscience.

Gauvain felt his very being shaken. His resolutions the most solid, his promises the most confidently made, his decisions the most irrevocable, all tottered in this terrible overwhelment of his will.

There are earthquakes of the soul.

The more he reflected upon that which he had lately seen, the more confused he became.

Gauvain, a Republican, believed himself to be, and was, just. A higher justice had revealed itself.

Above the justice of revolutions there is the justice of humanity.

That which was could not be avoided; the situation was grave; Gauvain was part of it; he could not withdraw himself; and, although Cimourdain had said to him: "It concerns you no further," he felt within his soul the pang which a tree may feel when torn up from its roots.

Every man has a base; a disturbance of this base causes a deep trouble, Gauvain now felt this trouble.

He pressed his head between his hands, as though searching for the truth. To state clearly a situation like his is not easy; nothing could be more painful; to simplify the complex, nothing is less easy; he had before him the formidable figures which he must sum up into a total; to judge a human destiny by mathematical rules; his head whirled; he tried; he endeavored to consider the matter; he forced himself to collect his ideas, to discipline the resistance which he felt within himself, and to recapitulate the facts.

He set them all before his mind.

Who has not made unto himself such a report, who has not questioned himself in some supreme circumstances upon the route which must be followed, whether to advance or to retreat?

Gauvain had just been a witness of a miracle.

Even before the earthly combat had fairly ended, there came a celestial struggle.

The conflict of good against evil.

A heart of adamant had been conquered.

Given the man with all that he had of evil within him, violence, error, blindness, unwholesome obstinacy, pride, egotism, Gauvain had just witnessed a miracle.

The victory of humanity over the man. Humanity had conquered the inhuman.

And by what means? in what way? how had it been able to overthrow that colossus of rage and hatred? what arms had it employed? what implement of war? The cradle.

Gauvain had been dazzled. In the height of civil war, in the very midst of all hatreds and of all vengeances, at the darkest and most furious moment of the tumult, at the hour when crime gave all its fires and hate all its blackness, at that period of the conflict when every sentiment becomes a projectile, when the struggle is so fierce that no one longer knows what is justice, honesty, or truth; suddenly, the Unknown, that mysterious warner of souls, sent the grand rays of eternal truth shining across human light and darkness.

Above that sombre duel between the false and the relatively true, there, in the depths, the face of truth unexpectedly appeared. Suddenly the face of the feeble had interposed.

He had seen three poor creatures, almost new-born, unreasoning, abandoned, orphans, alone, lisping, smiling, having against them civil war, retaliation, the horrible logic of reprisals, murder, carnage, fratricide, rage, hatred, all the Gorgons, triumph against those powers; he had seen the defeat and extinction of a conflagration charged with the commission of a horrible crime; he had seen atrocious premeditations disconcerted and brought to naught; he had seen ancient feudal ferocity, inexorable disdain, the professed experiences of the necessities of war, the reasons of State, all the arrogant resolves of a savage old age, vanish before the clear gaze of those who had not yet lived; and this was but natural, for he who has not yet lived has done no evil, he is justice, truth, purity, and the highest angels of heaven hover about the souls of little children.

A useful spectacle; a counsel; a lesson. The maddened, merciless combatants, in the face of all the projects of war, all the outrages, fanaticisms, assassinations, revenge kindling the fagots, death coming torch in hand, had suddenly seen all-powerful Innocence raise itself above this enormous legion of crimes.

And Innocence had conquered.

And one could say: No, civil war does not exist, barbarism does not exist, hatred does not exist, crime does not exist, darkness does not exist; to scatter these spectres it needed only that dawn, Innocence.

Never, in any conflict, had Satan and God been more plainly visible.

This conflict had a human conscience for its arena.

The conscience of Lantenac.

Now the battle began again, more desperate and perhaps still more decisive, in another conscience.

The conscience of Gauvain.

What a battle-ground is the soul of man!

We are given up to those gods, those monsters, those giants, our thoughts.

Often these terrible belligerents trample down our very souls.

Gauvain meditated.

The Marquis de Lantenac, surrounded, doomed, condemned, outlawed, shut in like the wild beast in the circus, held like a nail in the pincers, inclosed in his refuge become his prison, bound on every side by a wall of iron and fire, had succeeded in stealing away. He had performed a miracle in escaping. He had accomplished that masterpiece, the most difficult of all in such a war, flight. He had again taken possession of the forest to intrench himself therein, of the district to fight there, of the shadow to disappear within it. He had once more become the formidable free man, the dangerous wanderer, the captain of the invincibles, the chief of the underground forces, the master of the woods. Gauvain had the victory, but Lantenac had his liberty. Henceforth Lantenac had security before him, limitless freedom, an inexhaustible choice of asylums. He was unseizable, unapproachable, inaccessible. The lion had been taken in the snare, and had broken through.

Well, he had re-entered it.

The Marquis de Lantenac had voluntarily, spontaneously, by his own free will, left the forest, the shadow, security, liberty, to return to that horrible peril; brave, the first time, when Gauvain saw him plunge into the fire at the risk of being ingulfed therein; brave a second time, when he descended that ladder which delivered him to his enemies, and which, a ladder of escape for others, was a ladder of perdition for him.

And why had he done this?

To save three children.

And now what were they about to do to this man?

Guillotine him.

Had these three children been his own? no; of his family? no; of his rank? no; for three little beggars, chance children, foundlings, unknown, ragged, barefooted, this noble, this prince, this old man, free, safe, triumphant, for escape is a triumph, had risked all, compromised all, lost all, and, at the same time that he had restored the babes, he had proudly carried his head, and this head, hitherto terrible, but now august, he had offered to his foes.

And what were they about to do?

To accept the sacrifice.

The Marquis de Lantenac had had the choice between the life of others and his own; in this superb option he had chosen death.

And it was to be granted him.

He was to be killed.

What a reward for heroism!

To respond to a generous act by a barbarous one!

What a degrading of the Revolution!

What a belittling of the Republic!

As this man of prejudice and feudal law, suddenly transformed, returned into the circle of humanity, they, the men who strove for deliverance and freedom, elected to cling to the horrors of civil war, to the routine of blood, to fratricide!

And the divine law of forgiveness, abnegation, redemption, sacrifice, existed for the supporters of error, and did not exist for the soldiers of truth!

What! not to make a struggle in magnanimity! to resign themselves to this defeat, they, the stronger, to show themselves the weaker, they the victorious, to become assassins, and cause it to be said that there were those on the side of monarchy who saved children, and those on the side of the Republic who killed old men!

The world would see this great soldier, this powerful octogenarian, this disarmed warrior, stolen rather than captured, seized in the performance of a good action, seized by his own permission with the sweat of a noble devotion still upon his brow, mount the steps of the scaffold as he would mount to the grandeur of an apotheosis! And they would put beneath the knife that head, about which would circle, as suppliants, the souls of the three little angels he had saved! and, before this punishment, infamous for the executioners, a smile would be seen on the face of that man, and on the face of the Republic the blush of shame!

And this would be done in the presence of Gauvain, the chief!

And, he who might prevent it, he would hold back! And he would rest content under that high-handed absolution. "This concerns thee no longer!" And he would not even say to himself that in such a case abdication of authority was complicity! And he would not perceive that, in an act so hideous, of he who does and he who permits to be done, he who permits to be done is worse than he who does, because he is the coward!

But this death, had he not promised it? Had not he, Gauvain, the merciful, declared that Lantenac should have no mercy, that he would himself deliver Lantenac to Cimourdain?

That head, he owed it. Well, he would pay the debt. So be it.

But was this truly the same head?

Hitherto Gauvain had seen in Lantenac only the barbarous warrior, the fanatic of royalty and feudalism, the slaughterer of prisoners, an assassin whom war had let loose, a man of blood. That man he had not feared; he had proscribed that proscriber; the inexorable would have found him inexorable. Nothing more simple, the road was marked out and terribly easy to follow, everything was foreseen, he would kill those who killed, the path of horror was clear and straight. Unexpectedly, that straight line had been broken, a sudden turn in the way revealed a new horizon, a metamorphosis had taken place. An unknown Lantenac entered upon the scene. A hero sprang up from the monster; more than a hero, a man. More than a soul, a heart. It was no longer a murderer that Gauvain had before him, but a savior. Gauvain was flung to the earth by a flood of celestial radiance. Lantenac had struck him with the thunderbolt of generosity.

And Lantenac transfigured could not transfigure Gauvain! What! was this stroke of light to produce no counterstroke! Was the man of the Past to push on in front, and the man of the Future to fall back? Was the man of barbarism and superstition suddenly to unfold angel wings, and soar aloft to watch the man of the ideal crawl beneath him in the mire and the night! Was Gauvain to lie wallowing in the blood-stained rut of the Past, while Lantenac rose to a new existence in the sublime Future!

Still another thing.

Their family!

This blood which he was about to spill,—for to let it be spilled was to spill it himself,—was not this his blood, his, Gauvain's? His grandfather was dead, but his grand-uncle lived; and this grand-uncle was the Marquis de Lantenac. Would not that ancestor who had gone to the grave rise to prevent his brother from being forced into it? Would he not command his grandson henceforth to respect that crown of white hairs, become pure as his own angelic halo? Did not a spectre with indignant eyes stand between him, Gauvain, and Lantenac?

Was, then, the aim of the Revolution to denaturalize man? Had she been born to break the ties of family, and to stifle the instincts of humanity? Far from it. It was to affirm these glorious realities, not to deny them, that '89 had risen. To overturn the Bastiles was to deliver humanity; to abolish feudality was to found families. The author being the point from whence authority sets out, and authority being included in the author, there can be no other authority than paternity; hence the legitimacy of the queen-bee who creates her people, and who, being the mother, is the queen; hence the absurdity of the king-man, who, not being the father, cannot be the master; hence the suppression of the king; hence the Republic. What is all this? It is family, it is humanity, it is revolution. Revolution is the accession of the peoples; and, at the bottom, the People is Man.

The question was whether, when Lantenac returned into humanity, Gauvain should return to his family.

The thing to decide was, whether the uncle and nephew should meet again in a higher light, or whether the nephew's retrogression should reply to the uncle's progress.

The question in this pathetic debate between Gauvain and his conscience had resolved itself into this, and the answer seemed to come of itself: he must save Lantenac.

Yes. But France?

Here the bewildering problem suddenly changed its face.

What! France driven to bay? France betrayed, flung open, unguarded! No longer having a moat, Germany would cross the Rhine; no longer a wall, Italy would leap the Alps, and Spain the Pyrenees. There would remain to France that great abyss, the Ocean. She had the gulf. She could back herself against it, and, a giantess, supported by the entire sea, could combat the whole earth. A position, after all, impregnable. Yet no, this position would fail her. The Ocean no longer belonged to her. In this Ocean there was England. True, England was at a loss how to cross it. Well, a man would fling her a bridge, a man would stretch out his hand to her, a man would go to Pitt, to Craig, to Cornwallis, to Dundas, to the pirates, and say: "Come!" a man would cry: "England, seize France!" And this man was the Marquis de Lantenac.

This man they now held fast. After three months of chase, of pursuit, of frenzy, he had at last been taken. The hand of the Revolution had just closed upon the accursed one; the clenched fist of '93 had seized this Royalist murderer by the throat; through that mysterious premeditation from on high which mixes itself in human affairs, it was in the dungeon belonging to his family that this parricide awaited his punishment; the feudal lord was in the feudal dungeon; the stones of his own castle rose against him and shut him in, and he who had sought to betray his country had been betrayed by his own dwelling. God had visibly arranged all this. The hour had sounded; the Revolution had taken prisoner this public enemy; he could no longer fight, he could no longer struggle, he could no longer harm; in this Vendée, which owned so many arms, his was the sole brain; with his extinction, civil war would be extinct; he was held fast; a tragic and fortunate conclusion; after so many massacres, so much carnage, he was a captive, this man had slain so pitilessly, and it was his turn to die.

And if some one should be found to save him!

Cimourdain, that is to say, '93, held Lantenac, that is to say, Monarchy, and could any one be found to snatch its prey from that hand of bronze! Lantenac, the man in whom was concentrated that sheaf of scourges called the Past, the Marquis de Lantenac was in the tomb, the heavy door of eternity had closed upon him, and would some one come, from without, to draw back the bolt, this social malefactor was dead, and with him died revolt, fratricidal contest, unnatural war; and would any one be found to resuscitate him!

Oh, how that death's-head would laugh!

How that spectre would say: "It is well; I live again, the idiots!"

How he would once more set himself at his hideous work! how joyously and implacably would this Lantenac plunge anew into the gulf of war and hatred, and on the morrow would be seen again houses burning, prisoners massacred, the wounded slain, women shot!

And, after all, did not Gauvain exaggerate this action which had fascinated him?

Three children were lost; Lantenac had saved them.

But who had flung them into that peril?

Was it not Lantenac?

Who had set those cradles in the heart of the fire?

Was it not Imânus?

Who was Imânus?

The lieutenant of the marquis.

The one responsible is the chief.

Hence, the incendiary and the assassin was Lantenac.

What had he done so admirable?

He had not persisted, that was all.

After having conceived the crime, he had recoiled before it. He had become horrified at himself. That mother's cry had awakened in him those remains of human mercy which exist in all souls, even the most hardened. At this cry he had turned upon his steps. Out of the night where he had buried himself, he hastened toward the day. After having brought about the crime, he caused its defeat. His whole merit consisted in this, not having been a monster to the end.

And in return for so little, to restore to him all! to give him freedom, the fields, the plains, air, day, restore to him the forest, which he would employ to shelter his bandits, restore to him liberty, which he would use to bring about slavery, restore to him life, which he would devote to death!

As for trying to come to an understanding with him, attempting to treat with that arrogant soul, as for proposing his deliverance under certain conditions, demanding if he would consent, were his life spared, henceforth to abstain from all hostilities and all revolt; what an error such an offer would be, what an advantage it would give him, against what scorn would the proposer wound himself, how he would freeze the questioner by his response: "Keep such shame for yourself! kill me!"

There was, in short, nothing to do with this man but to kill him or to set him free. This man was ever ready to soar or to sacrifice himself; there was within him at once the eagle and the abyss. A mysterious soul.

To kill him? how wrong that seemed! to set him free? what a responsibility!

Lantenac saved, all would begin anew with the Vendée, like a struggle with a hydra whose heads had not been severed. In the twinkling of an eye, and with the rapidity of a meteor, all the flame extinguished by this man's disappearance would blaze up again. Lantenac would never stop to rest until he had carried out that execrable plan, to place, like the cover of a tomb, Monarchy upon the Republic, and England upon France. To save Lantenac was to sacrifice France; life to Lantenac was death to a host of innocent beings, men, women, children, caught anew in that domestic war; it was the landing of the English, the driving back of the Revolution, the sacking of the villages, the rending of the people, the mangling of Brittany, the prey flung back into the vulture's claw. And Gauvain, in the midst of uncertain gleams and rays of introverted light, beheld, vaguely sketched across his reverie, this problem arise: the setting at liberty of the tiger.

And then the question reappeared under its first aspect; the stone of Sysiphus, which is nothing other than the combat of man with himself, fell back: was Lantenac that tiger?

Perhaps he had been; but was he now? Gauvain was dazed beneath the whirl and conflict in his soul; his thoughts turned and circled upon themselves with serpentine swiftness. After the closest examination could any one deny Lantenac's devotion, his stoical self-abnegation, his superb disinterestedness? What! in the presence of the open jaws of civil war to attest his humanity! What! in this contest of inferior truths, to bring the highest truth of all! what! to prove that above royalties, above revolutions, above earthly questions, is the grand tenderness of the human soul, the protection due to the feeble from the strong, the safety due to those who are perishing from those who are saved, the paternity due to all little children from all old men! To prove these magnificent truths and to prove them by the sacrifice of his head. To be a general, and renounce strategy, battle, revenge! What! to be a Royalist, and to take a balance and put in one scale the King of France, a monarchy of fifteen centuries, old laws to re-establish, ancient society to restore, and in the other, three little unknown peasants, and to find the King, the throne, the sceptre, and fifteen centuries of monarchy too light to weigh against these three innocents! what! was all that nothing? What! Could he who had done this remain a tiger? Ought he to be treated like a wild beast? No! no! no! The man who had just illuminated the abyss of civil war by the light of a divine action was not a monster. The sword-bearer was metamorphosed into the angel of day. The infernal Lucifer had again become the celestial Lucifer. Lantenac had atoned for all his barbarities by one act of sacrifice; in losing himself materially he had saved himself morally; he had again become innocent; he had signed his own pardon. Does not the right of self-forgiveness exist? Henceforth he was venerable.

Lantenac had just shown himself almost superhuman. It was now Gauvain's turn.

Gauvain was called upon to answer him.

The struggle of good and evil passions made the world a chaos at this epoch; Lantenac, dominating the chaos, had just brought humanity out of it; it now remained for Gauvain to bring forth their family therefrom.

What was he about to do?

Was Gauvain about to betray the trust Providence had shown in him?

No. And he murmured within himself, "Let us save Lantenac."

And a voice answered: "It is well. Go on, aid the English. Desert. Pass over to the enemy. Save Lantenac and betray France."

And he shuddered.

"Thy solution is no solution, oh, dreamer!" Gauvain saw the Sphinx smile bitterly in the shadow.

This situation was a sort of formidable meeting-ground where hostile truths confronted one another, and where the three highest ideas of man, humanity, family, country, looked each other in the face.

Each of these voices took up the word in its turn, and each uttered the truth. Each in its turn seemed to find the point where wisdom and justice met, and said, "Do this!" Was that the thing he ought to do? Yes. No. Argument said one thing; sentiment said another; the two counsels were in direct opposition. Logic is only reason; feeling is often conscience; the one comes from man himself, the other from a higher source.

Hence it is that sentiment has less clearness and more power.

Still, what force stern reason possesses!

Gauvain hesitated.

Maddening perplexity. Two abysses opened before Gauvain. Should he let the marquis perish? or should he save him? He must plunge into one depth or the other.

Toward which of the two gulfs did Duty point?

III.

THE COMMANDANT'S CLOAK

It was, after all, with a duty that these victors had to deal.

This duty appeared, stern in the eyes of Cimourdain, terrible in the eyes of Gauvain.

Simple to the one; complex, diverse, tortuous, to the other.

Midnight sounded, then one o'clock.

Without being conscious of it, Gauvain had gradually approached the entrance to the breach.

The slowly dying conflagration flung out only intermittent gleams.

The plateau, on the other side of the tower, caught the reflection and became visible for an instant, then disappeared from view as the smoke swept over the flames. This glare, disclosing all and again cut by sudden shadows, distorted objects and made the sentinels look like phantoms. Gauvain, lost in his reverie, mechanically watched the strife between the flame and the smoke. These appearances and disappearances of the light before his eyes had a strange, subtle analogy with the revealing and concealment of truth in his soul.

Suddenly, between two clouds of smoke, a long streak of flame, shot out from the dying brasier, vividly illuminated the summit of the plateau, and brought out against the background the vermilion skeleton of a wagon. Gauvain stared at this wagon; it was surrounded by horsemen wearing gendarmes' hats. It seemed to him the wagon which he, by the aid of Guéchamp's glass, had seen on the edge of the horizon several hours before, when the sun was setting. Some men were standing in the cart and appeared to be unloading it. That which they took off seemed to be heavy, and now and then gave out the sound of clanking iron; it would have been difficult to tell what it was; it looked like beams for a frame-work; two of the men lifted between them and set upon the ground a box, which, as well as he could judge by the shape, contained a triangular object. The streak of light faded, all was again buried in darkness; Gauvain, with fixed eyes, stood, lost in thought, gazing at that which the darkness hid.

Lanterns were lighted, men came and went on the plateau, but the forms of those moving about were confused, and moreover, Gauvain, being below and on the other side of the ravine, could see but little of what was passing.

Voices spoke, but he could not catch the words. Now and then came a sound like the shock of timbers striking together. He could hear also a strange metallic grinding, like the sharpening of a scythe.

Two o'clock struck.

Slowly, and like one who strove to retreat and yet was forced by some invisible power to advance, Gauvain approached the breach. As he came near, the sentinel, recognizing in the shadow the cloak and braided hood of the commandant, presented arms. Gauvain entered the hall of the ground-floor, which had been transformed into a guard-room. A lantern hung from the roof. It cast just light enough so that one could cross the hall without treading upon the soldiers who lay, most of them asleep, upon the straw.

There they lay; they had been fighting there a few hours before; the grape-shot, partially swept away, scattered its grains of iron and lead over the floor and troubled their repose somewhat; but they were weary, and so they slept. This hall had been the battle-ground; the scene of a frenzied attack; there men had groaned, howled, ground their teeth, struck out blindly in their death-agony, and expired; many of their companions had fallen dead upon this floor, where now they lay in their weariness; the straw which served them for a pillow had drunk the blood of their comrades; now all was ended; the blood had ceased to flow, the sabres were dried, the dead were dead; these sleepers slumbered peacefully. Such is war. And then, perhaps to-morrow, the sleep of all may be the sleep of death.

At Gauvain's entrance a few of the men rose, among others, the officer in command. Gauvain pointed to the door of the dungeon.

"Open it," said he to the officer.

The bolts were drawn back, the door opened.

Gauvain entered the dungeon.

The door closed behind him.

BOOK SEVEN

FEUDALITY AND REVOLUTION

I.

THE ANCESTOR

A lamp was set on the flags of the crypt at the side of the square air-hole of the lower dungeon.

There could also be seen on the stones a jug of water, a loaf of army bread, and a truss of straw. The crypt being cut out in the rock, the prisoner who had conceived the idea of setting fire to the straw would have done it to his own hurt; no risk of fire to the prison, the certainty of suffocation to the prisoner.

At the instant when the door turned on its hinges the marquis was walking to and fro in his dungeon; that mechanical pacing back and forth natural to wild animals in a cage.

At the noise of the opening and shutting of the door he raised his head, and the lamp which stood on the floor between Gauvain and the marquis, shone full upon the faces of both men.

They looked at one another, and something in the glance of either kept the two motionless.

At length the marquis burst out laughing, and exclaimed:

"Good-evening, monsieur. It is a long time since I have had the pleasure of meeting you. You do me the honor of paying me a visit. I thank you. I ask nothing better than to talk a little. I was beginning to bore myself. Your friends lose a great deal of time—proofs of identity—courts-martial—all those ceremonies take a long while. I could finish much more quickly. Here I am in my house. Do me the favor to enter. Well, what do you say of all that is happening? Original, is it not? Once upon a time there was a king and a queen; the king was the king; the queen was France. They cut off the king's head, and married the queen to Robespierre; this gentleman and this lady have a daughter named Guillotine, with whom it appears that I am to make acquaintance to-morrow morning. I shall be delighted. As I am to see you. Did you come about that? Have you risen in rank? Shall you be the headsman? If it is a simple visit of friendship, I am touched. Monsieur le vicomte, perhaps you no longer know what a nobleman is like. Well, you see one; it is I. Look at the specimen. It is an odd race; it believes in God, it believes in tradition, it believes in family, it believes in its ancestors, it believes in the example of its father, in fidelity, in loyalty, in duty toward its prince, in respect to ancient laws, in virtue, in justice; and it would shoot you with pleasure. Have the goodness to sit down, I pray you. On the stones, it must be; for I have no arm-chair in my salon; but he who lives in the mire can sit on the ground. I do not say that to offend you, for what we call the mire you call the nation. I fancy that you do not insist I shall shout Liberty, Equality, Fraternity? This is an ancient chamber of my house; formerly the lords imprisoned rustics here; now rustics imprison the lords. These stupidities are called a revolution. It appears that in thirty-six hours my head is to be cut off. I see nothing inconvenient in that. Still, if my captors had been polite, they would have sent me my snuff-box, it is up in the chamber of the mirrors, where you used to play when you were a child, where I used to dance you on my knees. Monsieur, let me tell you one thing, you call yourself Gauvain, and, strange to say, you have noble blood in your veins, yes, by Heaven, the same that runs in mine, yet the blood that made me a man of honor makes you a rascal. Such are personal idiosyncrasies. You will tell me it is not your fault that you are a rascal. Nor is it mine that I am a gentleman. Zounds! one is a malefactor without knowing it. It comes from the air one breathes; in times like these of ours one is not responsible for what one does; the Revolution is guilty for the whole world, and all your great criminals are great innocents. What blockheads! To begin with yourself. Permit me to admire you. Yes, I admire a youth like you, who, a man of quality, well placed in the world, having noble blood to shed in a noble cause, vicomte of this castle of Gauvain, Prince of Brittany, duke by right, and peer of France by heritage, which is about all a man of good sense could desire here below, amuses himself, being what he is, to be what you are, playing his part so well that he produces upon his enemies the effect of a rascal, and on his friends, that of an idiot. By-the-way, give my compliments to the Monsieur the Abbé Cimourdain."

The marquis spoke perfectly at his ease, quietly, emphasizing nothing, in his polite society voice, his eyes clear and tranquil, his hand in his waistcoat-pocket. He stopped, drew a long breath, and resumed:

"I do not conceal from you that I have done what I could to kill you. Such as you see me, I have myself, in person, three times aimed a cannon at you. A discourteous proceeding. I admit it, but it would be giving rise to a bad example to suppose that in war your enemy tries to make himself agreeable to you. For we are in war, monsieur my nephew. Everything is put to fire and sword. Into the bargain, it is true that they have killed the king. A pretty century,"

He checked himself again, and again resumed :

" When one thinks that none of these things would have happened if Voltaire had been hanged and Rousseau sent to the galleys ! Ah, those men of mind !—what scourges ! But there, what is it with which you reproach that monarchy? It is true that the Abbé Pucelle was sent to his Abbey of Corbigny with as much time as he pleased for the journey, and as for your Monsieur Titon, who had been, begging your pardon, a terrible debauché, and had gone the rounds of the loose women before hunting after the miracles of Deacon Paris, he was transferred from the Castle of Vincennes to the Castle of Ham in Picardy, which is, I confess, a sufficiently ugly place. There are wrongs for you ; I recollect ; I also cried out in my day. I was as stupid as you."

The marquis felt in his pocket as if seeking his snuff-box, then continued :

" But not so wicked. They talked just for talk's sake. There was also the mutiny of demands and petitions ; and then up came those gentlemen the philosophers, and their writings were burned instead of the authors ; the court cabals mixed themselves in the matter, there were all those stupid fellows, Turgot, Quesnay, Malesherbes, the physiocratists, and so forth, and the quarrel began. The whole came from the scribblers and the rhymsters. The encyclopedia! Diderot! d'Alembert! Ah, the wicked scoundrels! To think of a well-born man like the King of Prussia joining them! As for me, I would have suppressed all those paper-scratchers. Ah, we were justiciaries, our family, you may see there on the wall the marks of the quartering-wheel. We did not jest. No, no, no scribblers! While there are Arouets, there will be Marats. As long as there are fellows who scribble, there will be scoundrels who assassinate; as long as there is ink, there will be black stains; as long as men's claws hold a goose's feather frivolous stupidities will engender atrocious ones. Books cause crimes. The word chimera has two meanings; it signifies dream and it signifies monster. How dearly one pays for idle trash! What is that you sing to us about your rights? The rights of man! Rights of the people! Is that empty enough, stupid enough, visionary enough, sufficiently devoid of sense? When I say: Havoise, the sister of Conan II., brought the county of Brittany to Hoël, Comte de Nantes and Cornwall, who left the throne to Alain Fergant, the uncle of Bertha, who espoused

Alain le Noir, Lord of Roche-sur-Yon, and bore him Conan the Little, grandfather of Guy or Gauvain de Thouars, our ancestor, I state a thing that is clear, and there is a right. But your scoundrels, your rascals, your wretches, what do they call their rights? Deicide and regicide. Is it not hideous? Oh, the clowns! I am sorry for you, monsieur; but you belong to this proud Brittany blood; you and I, we had Gauvain de Thouars for our grandfather; we had for another grandfather that great Duke of Montbazon who was a peer of France and honored with the Grand Collar, who attacked the suburb of Tours, and was wounded at the Battle of Argues, and who died Master of the Hounds of France, in his house of Couzières in Touraine, aged eighty-six. I could tell you still further of the Duke de Laudunois, son of the Lady of Garnache, of Claude de Lorraine, Duke de Chevreuse, and of Henri de Lenoncourt and of Françoise de Laval-Boisdauphin. But to what purpose? Monsieur has the honor of being an idiot, and considers himself the equal of my groom. Learn this, I was already an old man while you were still a youngster; I am as much your superior now, you brat, as I was then. As you grew up you found means to belittle yourself. Since we ceased to see one another each has gone his own way, I followed honesty, you went in the opposite direction. Ah, I do not know how all that will finish, but messieurs, your friends, are full-blown wretches! Verily, it is fine, I grant you, a marvelous step gained in the cause of progress, you have suppressed in the army the punishment of the pint of water inflicted on the drunken soldier for three consecutive days; to have the Maximum, the Convention, Bishop Gobel, Monsieur Chaumette, and Monsieur Hébert, and you have wiped out the Past in one mass, from the Bastile to the almanach. They replace the saints by vegetables. So be it, messieurs, the citizens; you are masters; reign; take your ease; do what you like, stop at nothing. All this does not hinder the fact that religion is religion, that royalty fills fifteen hundred years of our history, and that the old French nobility, even with their heads off, are loftier than you. As for your caviling over the historic rights of royal races, we shrug our shoulders at that. Chilpéric, in reality, was only a monk named Daniel; it was Rainfroy who invented Chilpéric, in order to annoy Charles Martel; we know those things just as well as you do. The question does not lie there. The question is this: given, a great kingdom; given, old France; given, a perfectly ordered country wherein were first considered the sacred persons of its monarchs, absolute lords of the State, then the princes, then the officers of the crown for the armies on land and on sea, for the artillery, for the direction and superintendence of the finances. After that came the officers of justice, great and small; those for the management of taxes and general receipts, and, lastly, the police of the kingdom in its three orders. All this was fine and nobly regulated; you have destroyed it. You have destroyed the provinces, like the lamentably ignorant creatures that you are, without even suspecting what the provinces really were. The genius of France held the genius of the entire continent; each province of France represented a virtue of Europe; the frankness of Germany was in Picardy; the generosity of Sweden in Champagne; the industry of Holland in Burgogne; the activity of Poland in Languedoc; the gravity of Spain in Gascony; the wisdom of Italy in Provence; the subtlety of Greece in Normandy; the fidelity of Switzerland in Dauphiny. You knew nothing of all that; you have broken, shattered, ruined, demolished; you have shown yourselves simply idiotic brutes. Ah! you will no longer have nobles? Well, you shall have none. Get your mourning ready. You shall have no more paladins, no more heroes. Say good-night to the ancient grandeurs. Find me a d'Assas now! You are all of you afraid for your skins. You will have no more Chevaliers de Fontenoy, who saluted before killing one another; you will have no more combatants like those in silk stockings at the siege of Lérida; you will have no more of those proud tournaments with the plumes floating past like meteors; you are a people finished; you will suffer the outrage of invasion; if Alaric II. could return, he would no longer find himself confronted by Clovis; if Abdérame could come back he would no longer find himself face to face with Charles Martel; if the Saxons should return they would no longer find Pépin before them; you will never again have Agnadel, Rocroy, Lens, Staffarde, Nerwinde, Steinkerque, La Marsaille, Raucoux, Lawfeld, Mahon; you will have no Marignan with Francis I.; you will have no Bouvines with Philippe-Auguste taking prisoner, with one hand, Renaud, Comte de Boulogne, and with the other, Ferrand, Comte de Flandre. You will have Agincourt, but you will no more have the Sieur de Bacqueville, grand bearer of the oriflamme, enveloping himself in his banner to die! Go on! go on! do your work! Be the new men! Become little."

The marquis was silent for an instant, then began again;

"But leave us great. Kill the kings, kill the nobles, kill the priests, tear down, ruin, massacre, trample under foot, crush ancient laws beneath your heels, overthrow the throne, stamp upon the altar of God, dash it in pieces, dance above it! that is your affair. You are traitors and cowards, incapable of devotion or sacrifice. I have spoken. Now, have me guillotined, monsieur le vicomte. I have the honor to be your very humble servant."

Then he added:

"Ah! I do not hesitate to set the truth plainly before you! What difference can it make to me? I am a dead man."

"You are free," said Gauvain.

And Gauvain advanced toward the marquis, unfastened his commandant's cloak, threw it about his shoulders, and drew the hood close down over his eyes. The two men were of the same height.

"Well? what are you doing?" asked the marquis.

Gauvain raised his voice, and cried:

"Lieutenant, open to me."

The door opened.

Gauvain exclaimed:

"Close the door carefully behind me!"

And he pushed the stupefied marquis across the threshold.

The hall transformed into a guard-room, was lighted, it will be remembered, by a horn lantern, whose faint rays only lit up the shadows here and there. In this dim light, such of the soldiers who were not asleep saw a man of lofty stature, wrapped in the mantle and hood of the commander-in-chief, pass through their midst and move toward the opening; they made a military salute and the man passed on.

The marquis slowly crossed the guard-room, passed through the breach, not without hitting his head more than once and went out.

The sentinel, believing that he saw Gauvain, presented arms.

When he was outside, having the grass of the fields under his feet, within two hundred feet of the forest, and before him space, night, liberty, life, he paused and stood motionless for an instant like a man who has allowed himself to be pushed on, who has yielded to surprise, and who, having taken advantage of an open door, asks himself if he has done well or ill, hesitates to go farther, and once more turns it over in his mind. After a few moments of deep reverie he raised his right hand, snapped his thumb and middle finger, and said: "My faith!"

And he hurried on.

The door of the dungeon had closed again. Gauvain was within.

II.

THE COURT-MARTIAL

At that period all courts-martial were very nearly discretionary. Dumas, in the Assembly, had proposed a rough plan of military legislation, improved later by Talot in the Council of the Five Hundred, but the definitive code of councils of war was only drawn up under the Empire. Let us add in parenthesis, that from the Empire dates the law imposed on military tribunals to commence receiving the votes by the lowest grade. Under the Revolution this law did not exist.

In 1793, the president of a military tribunal was almost the tribunal in himself; he chose the members, classed the order of grades, regulated the manner of voting; he was at once master and judge.

Cimourdain had selected for the hall of the court-martial that very room on the ground-floor where the retirade had been erected and where the guard was now established. He wished to shorten everything, the road from the prison to the tribunal and the passage from the tribunal to the scaffold.

In conformity with his orders the court began its sitting at midday with no other show of state than this: three straw-bottomed chairs, a pine table, two lighted candles, a stool in front of the table.

The chairs were for the judges, and the stool for the accused. At either end of the table also stood a stool, one for the commissioner auditor, who was a quartermaster; the other for the registrar, who was a corporal.

On the table were a stick of red sealing-wax, a brass seal of the Republic, two ink-stands, some sheets of white paper, and two printed placards spread open, the first containing the declaration of outlawry, the second the decree of the Convention.

The tricolored flag hung on the back of the middle chair; in that period of rude simplicity decorations were quickly arranged, and it needed little time to change a guard-room into a court of justice.

The middle chair, intended for the president, stood facing the prison door.

The soldiers made up the audience.

Two gendarmes stood on guard by the stool.

Cimourdain was seated in the middle chair, having at his right Captain Guéchamp, first judge, and at his left Sergeant Radoub, second judge.

He wore a hat with a tricolored cockade, his sabre at his side, and his two pistols in his belt. His scar, of a vivid red, added to his savage appearance.

Radoub's wound had been only partially staunched. He had a handkerchief knotted about his head, upon which a blood-stain slowly grew larger.

At midday the court had not yet opened its proceedings, a messenger, whose horse could be heard stamping outside, stood near the table of the tribunal. Cimourdain was writing. He wrote thus:

"Citizen members of the Committee of Public Safety:

"Lantenac is taken. He will be executed to-morrow."

He dated and signed the dispatch, folded and sealed it, and handed it to the messenger, who departed.

This done, Cimourdain called in a loud voice:

"Open the dungeon."

The two gendarmes drew back the bolts, opened the door of the dungeon, and entered.

Cimourdain lifted his head, folded his arms, fixed his eyes on the door, and cried:

"Bring out the prisoner."

A man appeared between the two gendarmes, standing beneath the arch of the doorway.

It was Gauvain.

Cimourdain started.

"Gauvain!" exclaimed he.

Then he added:

"I demand the prisoner."

"It is I," said Gauvain.

"Thou?"

"I."

"And Lantenac?"

"He is free."

"Free!"

"Yes."

"Escaped?"

"Escaped."

Cimourdain trembled as he stammered:

"In truth, the castle belongs to him, he knows all its outlets. The dungeon may communicate with some secret opening—I ought to have remembered that he would find means to escape, he would not need any person's aid for that."

"He was aided," said Gauvain.

"To escape?"

"To escape."

"Who aided him?"

"I."

"Thou!"

"I."

"Thou art dreaming!"

"I went into the dungeon, I was alone with the prisoner, I took off my cloak, I put it about his shoulders; I drew the hood down over his face, he went out in my stead, and I remained in his. Here I am."

"Thou didst not do it!"

"I did it."

"It is impossible!"

"It is true."

"Bring me Lantenac!"

"He is no longer here. The soldiers, seeing the commandant's cloak, took him for me, and allowed him to pass. It was still dark."

"Thou art mad."

"I tell you what was done."

A silence followed. Cimourdain stammered:

"Then thou hast merited . . ."

"Death," said Gauvain.

Cimourdain was pale as a corpse. He sat motionless as a man who had just been struck by lightning. He no longer seemed to breathe. A great drop of sweat stood out on his forehead.

He forced his voice into firmness, and said:

"Gendarmes, seat the accused."

Gauvain placed himself on the stool.

Cimourdain added:

"Gendarmes, draw your sabres."

This was the custom when the accused was being tried for a capital crime.

Cimourdain's voice had regained its ordinary tone.

"Accused," said he, "stand up."

He no longer said thee and thou to Gauvain.

III.

THE VOTES

Gauvain rose.

"What is your name?" asked Cimourdain.

Gauvain answered:

"Gauvain."

Cimourdain continued the interrogatory:

"Who are you?"

"I am Commander-in-Chief of the Expeditionary Column of the Côtes-du-Nord."

"Are you a relative or a connection of the man who has escaped?"

"I am his grand-nephew."

"You are acquainted with the decree of the Convention?"

"I see the placard lying on your table."

"What have you to say in regard to this decree?"

"That I countersigned it, that I ordered its carrying out, that it was I who had this placard written, at the bottom of which is my name."

"Choose a defender."

"I will defend myself."

"Speak."

Cimourdain had become again impassible. But his impassibility resembled the sternness of a rock rather than the calmness of a man.

Gauvain remained silent for a moment as if collecting his thoughts.

Cimourdain spoke again:

"What have you to say in your defense?"

Gauvain slowly raised his head, but without fixing his eyes upon either of the judges, and replied:

"This: one thing prevented my seeing another; a good action, seen too close at hand, hid from me a hundred criminal deeds; on one side, an old man; on the other, three children, all these put themselves between me and duty. I forgot the burned villages, the ravaged fields, the butchered prisoners, the slaughtered wounded, the women shot, I forgot France betrayed to England; I set at liberty the murderer of our country. I am guilty. In speaking thus, I seem to speak against myself; it is not so. I speak in my own behalf. When the guilty one acknowledges his fault, he saves the only thing worth the trouble of saving, honor."

"Is that," answered Cimourdain, "all you have to say in your defense?"

"I add, that being the chief, I owed an example, and that you in your turn, being judges, owe one."

"What example do you demand?"

"My death."

"You find that just?"

"And necessary."

"Be seated."

The quartermaster, who was auditor commissioner, rose and read, first, the decree of outlawry against the ci-devant Marquis de Lantenac; secondly, the decree of the Convention ordaining capital punishment to whosoever should aid the escape of a rebel prisoner. He closed with the lines printed at the bottom of the placard, forbidding "to give aid or succor" to the above-named rebel "under penalty of death," and signed: "Commander-in-Chief of the Expeditionary Column,

"GAUVAIN."

These notices read, the auditor commissioner sat down again.

Cimourdain folded his arms and said:

"Accused, pay attention. Let those assembled listen, look, and be silent. You have before you the law. The votes will now be taken. The sentence will be given according to the majority. Each judge will announce his decision aloud, in the presence of the accused, justice having nothing to conceal."

Cimourdain continued:

"The first judge will give his vote. Speak, Captain Guéchamp."

Captain Guéchamp seemed to see neither Cimourdain, nor Gauvain. His downcast lids concealed his eyes, which remained fixed upon the placard of the decree as if they were staring at a gulf. He said:

"The law is immutable. A judge is more and less than a man; he is less than a man because he has no heart; he is more than a man because he holds the sword of justice. In the 414th year of Rome, Manlius put his son to death for the crime of having conquered without his orders. Violated discipline demanded an example. Here, it is the law which has been violated, and the law is still higher than discipline. Through a feeling of pity, the country is again endangered. Pity may assume the proportions of a crime. Commandant Gauvain has helped the rebel Lantenac to escape. Gauvain is guilty. I vote death."

"Write, registrar," said Cimourdain.

The clerk wrote: "Captain Guéchamp: death."

Gauvain's voice rang out:

"Guéchamp," said he, "you have voted well, and I thank you."

Cimourdain resumed:

"It is the turn of the second judge. Speak, Sergeant Radoub."

Radoub rose, turned toward Gauvain, and made the accused a military salute. Then he cried:

"If that is the way it goes, then guillotine me. For I give here, before God, my most sacred word of honor that I would like to have done, first, what the old man did, and, after that, what my commandant did. When I saw that old fellow, eighty years of age, jump into the fire to pull three brats out of it, I said, 'Old fellow, you are a brave man!' and when I hear that my commandant has saved that old man from your beast of a guillotine, by the thousand gods of hell, I say: 'My commandant, you ought to be my general, and you are a true man, and, as for me, thunder! I would give you the Cross of Saint Louis if there were still crosses, or Saints, or Louises. Oh, there! are we going to turn idiots now? If it was for these sort of things that we gained the battle of Jemmapes, the battle of Valmy, the battle of Fleurus, and the battle of Wattignies, then you had better say so. What! here is Commandant Gauvain, who, for these four months past, has been driving those asses of Royalists to the beat of the drum, and saving the Republic by his sword, and who did a thing at Dol which needed a world of brains to do, and, when you have a man like that, you try to get rid of him! and, instead of electing him your general, you want to cut off his head! I say it is enough to make a fellow throw himself off the Pont-Neuf head foremost, and, you yourself, Citizen Gauvain, my commandant, if you were my corporal instead of being my superior, I would tell you that you have been talking a heap of infernal nonsense just now. The old man did a fine thing in saving the children, you did a fine thing in saving the old man, and if we are going to guillotine people for good actions, why, then, get away with you all to the devil, for I don't know any longer what the question is about. There's nothing to hold fast to. It is not true, is it, all this? I pinch myself to see if I am awake. I can't understand. So the old man ought to have let the babies burn alive, and my commandant ought to have let the old man's head be cut off. See here, guillotine me. I would as soon have it done as not. Just take this into consideration, if the children had been killed, the battalion of the Bonnet-Rouge would have been dishonored. Is that what you wanted? Why, then, let us eat each other and be done with it. I understand politics as well as any of you, I belonged to the Club of the Section of Pikes. Zounds! we are coming to the end! I sum up the matter according to my way of looking at it. I don't like things to be done which are so puzzling you don't know any longer where you stand. What the devil is it we get ourselves killed for? In order that somebody may kill our chief! Let us have none of that, Lisette. I want my chief! I will have my chief! I love him better to-day than I did yesterday. Send him to the guillotine? Why, you make me laugh! Now we are not going to have anything of that sort. I have listened. People may say what they please. In the first place, it is not possible!"

And Radoub sat down again. His wound had reopened. A thin stream of blood exuded from under the kerchief, and ran down his neck from the place where his ear had been.

Cimourdain turned towards Radoub.

"You vote for the acquittal of the accused?"

"I vote," said Radoub, "that he be made general."

"I ask if you vote for his acquittal."

"I vote for his being made head of the Republic."

"Sergeant Radoub, do you vote that Commandant Gauvain be acquitted—yes or no?"

"I vote that my head be cut off in place of his."

"Acquittal," said Cimourdain. "Write it, registrar."

The clerk wrote: "Sergeant Radoub: acquittal."

Then the clerk said:

"One vote for death. One vote for acquittal. A tie."

It was Cimourdain's turn to vote.

He rose. He took off his hat and laid it on the table.

He was no longer pale or livid. His face was the color of clay.

Had all the spectators been corpses lying there in their winding-sheets the silence could not have been more profound.

Cimourdain said, in a slow, firm, solemn voice:

"Accused, the case has been heard. In the name of the Republic, the court-martial, by a majority of two voices . . ."

He stopped, there was a moment of terrible suspense; did he hesitate before pronouncing the sentence of death? did he hesitate before granting life? every listener held his breath. Cimourdain continued:

"Condemns you to death."

His face expressed the torture of an awful triumph. Jacob, when he forced the angel, whom he had overthrown in the darkness, to bless him, must have worn that fearful smile.

It was only a gleam and it passed. Cimourdain was marble again, he seated himself, put on his hat, and added:

"Gauvain, you will be executed to-morrow, at sunrise."

Gauvain rose, saluted, and said:

"I thank the Court."

"Lead away the condemned," said Cimourdain.

Cimourdain made a sign, the door of the dungeon reopened, Gauvain entered, the door closed. The two gendarmes stood on guard,—one on either side of the arch, sabre in hand.

Sergeant Radoub fell senseless upon the ground and was carried away.

IV.

AFTER CIMOURDAIN THE JUDGE, CIMOURDAIN THE MASTER

A camp is a wasps' nest. Above all in revolutionary times. The civic sting which is in the soldier moves quickly, and does not hesitate to prick the chief after having chased away the enemy. The valiant troop which had taken La Tourgue was filled with diverse murmurings ; at first against Commandant Gauvain when it learned that Lantenac had escaped. When Gauvain was seen coming from the dungeon which they had thought held the marquis, the news spread as if by electricity, and in an instant the whole army was informed. The first murmur was : "They are trying Gauvain. But it is a sham. Trust ci-devants and priests ! We have just seen a vicomte save a marquis, and now we are going to see a priest absolve a noble !" When the news of Gauvain's condemnation came, there was a second murmur : "It is horrible ! Our chief, our brave chief, our young commander, a hero ! He may be a vicomte, very well, so much the more merit in his being a Republican. What, he, the liberator of Pontorson, of Villedieu, of Pont-au-Beau! the conqueror of Dol and of La Tourgue! he who makes us invincible! he, the sword of the Republic in the Vendée! the man who for five months has held the Chouans at bay and repaired all the blunders of Léchelle and the others! this Cimourdain dares to condemn him to death! Why? because he saved an old man who had saved three children! a priest kill a soldier!"

Thus muttered the victorious and discontented camp. A stern rage surged around Cimourdain. Four thousand men against one, that seems as if it should be a power; it is not. These four thousand men were a crowd, and Cimourdain was a will. It was known that Cimourdain's frown came easily, and nothing more was needed to hold the army in respect. In those stern days it was sufficient for a man to have behind him the shadow of the Committee of Public Safety to make that man formidable and to make an imprecation die into a whisper and the whisper into silence. Before, as after the murmurs, Cimourdain remained the arbiter of Gauvain's fate as he did of the fate of all. They knew there was nothing to ask of him, that he would obey only his conscience, a superhuman voice audible to his ear alone. Everything depended upon him. That which he had done as martial judge, he alone could undo as civil delegate. He alone could show mercy. He possessed unlimited power ; by a sign he could set Gauvain at liberty ; he was master of life and death ; he commanded the guillotine. In this tragic moment he was the man supreme.

They could only wait.

Night came.

V.

THE DUNGEON

The hall of justice had again become a guard-room ; the guard was doubled as upon the previous evening ; two sentinels stood on duty before the closed door of the prison.

Toward midnight, a man who held a lantern in his hand crossed the hall, made himself known to the sentries, and ordered the dungeon opened.

It was Cimourdain.

He entered, and the door remained open behind him.

The dungeon was dark and silent. Cimourdain moved forward a step in the gloom, set the lantern on the ground, and stood still. He could hear amidst the shadows the measured breathing of a sleeping man. Cimourdain thoughtfully listened to this peaceful sound.

Gauvain lay on a bundle of straw at the farther end of the dungeon. It was his breathing which caught the new-comer's ear. He was sleeping soundly.

Cimourdain advanced as noiselessly as possible, moved close, and looked down upon Gauvain; the glance of a mother watching her child's slumber could not have been more tender or full of love. Even Cimourdain's will could not control that glance; Cimourdain pressed his clenched hands against his eyes with the gesture one sometimes sees in children, and remained for a moment motionless. Then he knelt, softly raised Gauvain's hand, and pressed his lips upon it.

Gauvain stirred. He opened his eyes full of the wonder of sudden waking. The lantern dimly lit up the cave. He recognized Cimourdain.

"Ah," said he, "it is you, my master."

And he added:

"I dreamed that Death was kissing my hand."

Cimourdain started as one sometimes does under the sudden rush of a flood of thoughts; at times the tide is so high and so stormy that it seems as if it would drown the soul. Not a word came from the overcharged depths of Cimourdain's heart. He could only say: "Gauvain!"

And the two gazed at one another; Cimourdain with his eyes full of those flames which dry up tears; Gauvain with his sweetest smile.

Gauvain raised himself on his elbow, and said:

"That scar I see on your face is the sabre-cut you received for me. Yesterday, too, you were in the thick of that fight, at my side and on my account. If Providence had not placed you near my cradle, where should I be to-day? In outer darkness. If I have my conception of duty, it is from you that it comes to me. I was born with my hands bound. Prejudices are ligatures, you loosened those bonds, you gave my growth liberty, and of that which was already only a mummy, you made anew a child. Into what would have been an abortion you put a conscience. Without you I should have grown up a dwarf. I exist by you. I was only a lord, you made me a citizen; I was only a citizen, you have made me a mind; you have made me, as a man, fit for this earthly life; and, as a soul, for the celestial life. You gave me, that I might know human reality, the key of truth, and, that I might go beyond that, the key of light. Oh, my master, I thank you. It is you who have created me."

Cimourdain seated himself on the straw beside Gauvain, and said:

"I have come to sup with thee."

Gauvain broke the black bread, and handed it to him. Cimourdain took a small piece, then Gauvain offered him the jug of water.

"Drink first," said Cimourdain.

Gauvain drank and passed the jug to Cimourdain who drank after him. Gauvain had only swallowed a mouthful; Cimourdain drank great draughts.

During this supper, Gauvain ate and Cimourdain drank. A sign of the calmness of the one and of the fever which consumed the other.

A serenity so strange that it was terrible reigned in this dungeon. These two men conversed.

Gauvain said:

"Grand events are sketching themselves. What the Revolution does at this moment is mysterious. Behind the visible work stands the invisible. One conceals the other. The visible work is savage, the invisible sublime. At this instant I perceive all very clearly. It is strange and beautiful. It has been necessary to make use of the materials of the Past. Hence this marvelous '93. Beneath a scaffolding of barbarism, a temple of civilization is building."

"Yes," replied Cimourdain. "From this provisional will rise the definitive. The definitive, that is to say, right and duty, taxes proportional and progressive, military service obligatory, a leveling without deviation, and above the whole, and making part of all, that straight line, the law. The republic of the absolute."

"I prefer," said Gauvain, "the republic of the ideal."

He paused for an instant, then continued:

"Oh, my master, in all that you have just said, where do you place devotion, sacrifice, abnegation, the magnanimous interlacing of kindnesses, love? To set all in equilibrium is well; to put all in harmony is better. Above the balance is the lyre. Your republic weighs, measures, regulates man; mine lifts him into the open sky; it is the difference between a theorem and an eagle."

"You lose yourself in the clouds."

"And you in calculation."

"Harmony is full of dreams."

"There are such, too, in algebra."

"I would have man made by the rules of Euclid."

"And I," said Gauvain, "would like him better as pictured by Homer."

Cimourdain's severe smile remained fixed upon Gauvain, as if to hold that soul steady.

"Poetry mistrusts poets."

"Yes, I know that saying. Mistrust the zephyrs, mistrust the sunshine, mistrust the sweet odors of spring, mistrust the flowers, mistrust the stars."

"None of these things can feed man."

"How do you know? Thought is nourishment. To think is to eat."

"No abstractions. The Republic is the law of two and two make four. When I have given to each the share which belongs to him . . ."

"It still remains to give the share which does not belong to him."

"What do you understand by that?"

"I understand the immense reciprocal concession which each owes to all and which all owe to each, and which is the whole of social life."

"Beyond the strict law there is nothing."

"There is everything."

"I see only justice."

"And I, I look higher."

"What can there be above justice?"

"Equity."

At times they paused as if lightning flashes passed before their eyes.

Cimourdain continued:

"Particularize; I defy you."

"So be it. You wish military service made obligatory. Against whom? Against other men. For my part I would have no military service. I want peace. You wish misery relieved, I wish an end put to misery. You want proportional taxes. I want no tax whatever. I wish the general expense reduced to its most simple expression and paid by the social surplus."

"What do you understand by that?"

"This: first do away with parasitisms; the parasitisms of the priest, the judge, the soldier. After that, turn your riches to account; you fling manure into the sewer; cast it into the furrow. Three parts of the country are waste land, clear up France, suppress useless pasture-grounds, divide the communal lands. Let each man have a farm and each farm a man. You will increase the social product a hundred-fold. At this moment France gives her peasants meat only four days in the year; well cultivated, she would nourish three hundred millions of men, all Europe. Utilize nature, that immense auxiliary so disdained. Make every wind toil for you, every waterfall, every magnetic effluence. The earth has a subterranean network of veins; there is in this network an immense circulation of water, oil, fire. Pierce those veins and make this water feed your fountains, this oil your lamps, this fire your hearths. Think of the movements of the waves, their flux and reflux, the ebb and flow of the tides. What is the ocean? an enormous power allowed to waste. How stupid the earth is not to make use of the sea!"

"There you are in the full tide of dreams."

"That is to say, of full reality."

Gauvain added:

"And woman? what will you do with her?"

Cimourdain replied:

"Leave her where she is. The servant of man."

"Yes. On one condition."

"What?"

"That man shall be the servant of woman."

"Can you think of it?" cried Cimourdain. "Man a servant! never. Man is master. I admit only one royalty, that of the fireside. Man in his house is king."

"Yes. On one condition."

"What?"

"That woman shall be queen there."

"That is to say, you wish for man and woman . . ."

"Equality."

"Equality! can you dream of it? The two creatures are different."

"I said equality. I did not say identity."

There was another pause, like a sort of truce between two spirits flinging lightnings. Cimourdain broke the silence: "And the offspring? To whom do you consign them?"

"First to the father who engenders, then to the mother who gives birth, then to the master who rears, then to the city that civilizes, then to the country which is the mother supreme, then to humanity, who is the great ancestor."

"You do not speak of God?"

"Each of those degrees, father, mother, master, city, country, humanity, is one of the rungs in the ladder which leads to God."

Cimourdain was silent.

Gauvain continued: "When one is at the top of the ladder, one has reached God. Heaven opens; one has only to enter."

Cimourdain made a gesture like one man calling back another.

"Gauvain, return to earth. We wish to realize the possible."

"Do not commence by rendering it impossible."

"The possible always realizes itself."

"Not always. If one treats Utopia harshly, one slays it. Nothing is more defenseless than the egg."

"Still it is necessary to seize Utopia, to put the yoke of realism upon it, to frame it in the actual. The abstract idea must transform itself into the concrete; that which it loses in beauty, it will gain in usefulness; it is lessened, but made better. Right must enter into law; and, when right makes itself law, it becomes absolute. That is what I call the possible."

"The possible is more than that."

"Ah! there you are wandering in dream-land again."

"The possible is a mysterious bird, always soaring above the head of man."

"It must be caught."

"Living."

Gauvain continued:

"This my idea of it: Constant progression. If God had meant man to retrograde, he would have placed an eye in the back of his head. Let us look always toward the dawn, the blossoming, the birth. That which falls encourages that which mounts. The crackling of the old tree is an appeal to the new. Each century must do its work, to-day civic, to-morrow human. To-day the question of right, to-morrow the question of recompense. Recompense and right, the same word in the end. Man does not live to be paid nothing; in giving life, God contracts a debt; right is the payment inborn; recompense is right acquired."

Gauvain spoke with the earnestness of a prophet. Cimourdain listened. Their rôles were changed, and now it seemed that it was the pupil who was master.

Cimourdain murmured:

"You go rapidly."

"Perhaps because I am a little pressed for time," said Gauvain, smiling.

And he added :

" Oh, my master ! behold the difference between our two Utopias ; you wish the garrison obligatory, I the school. You dream of man the soldier, I dream of man the citizen. You want him terrible, I want him a thinker. You would found a republic of swords ; I would found . . ."

He interrupted himself :

" I would found a republic of intellects."

Cimourdain bent his eyes on the pavement of the dungeon, and said :

" And while waiting for it, what would you have ?"

" That which is."

" Then you absolve the present moment ?"

" Yes."

" Wherefore ?"

" Because it is a tempest. A tempest knows always what it does. For one oak uprooted, how many forests purified ! Civilization had the plague, this great wind cures it. Perhaps it is not so careful as it ought to be. But could it do otherwise than it does ? It is charged with a difficult task. In the presence of the horror of fever, I understand the fury of the blast."

Gauvain continued :

" Moreover, why should I fear the tempest if I have my compass, and how can events affect me if I have my conscience !"

And he added, in a low, solemn voice :

"There is a power that must always be allowed to guide."

"What?" asked Cimourdain.

Gauvain raised his finger above his head. Cimourdain's eyes followed the direction of that uplifted finger, and it seemed to him as if, even through the dungeon vault, he beheld the starlit sky.

Both were silent again.

Cimourdain spoke first :

"Society is greater than Nature. I tell you, this is no longer a possibility, it is a dream."

"It is the goal. Otherwise of what use is society? Remain in nature. Be savages. Tahati is a paradise. Only the inhabitants of that paradise do not think. An intelligent hell would be preferable to an imbruted heaven. But no, no hell. Let us be a human society. Greater than nature? Yes. If you add nothing to nature, why go beyond nature? Content yourself with work like the ant, and with honey like the bee. Remain the working drudge instead of being the queen intelligence. If you add to nature, you necessarily become greater than she ; to add is to augment ; to augment is to render greater. Society is nature sublimated. I want all that is lacking to bee-hives, all that is lacking to ant-hills, monuments, arts, poetry, heroes, genius. To bear eternal burdens is not the destiny of man. No, no, no, no more pariahs, no more slaves, no more convicts, no more damned! I desire that each of the attributes of man should be a symbol of civilization and a patron of progress; I would place liberty before the spirit, equality before the heart, fraternity before the soul. No! no more yokes! man was made not to drag chains, but to soar on wings. No more of the man-reptile. I wish the transfiguration of the larva into the winged creature; I wish the worm of the earth to turn into a living flower and fly away. I wish . . ."

He stopped. His eyes blazed.

His lips moved. He ceased to speak.

The door had remained open. Sounds from without penetrated into the dungeon. The distant peal of trumpets could be heard, probably the reveille; then the butt-end of muskets striking the ground as the sentinels were relieved; then, quite near the tower, as well as one could judge, a noise like the moving of planks and beams; followed by muffled, intermittent echoes like the strokes of a hammer.

Cimourdain grew pale as he listened. Gauvain heard nothing.

His reverie became more and more profound. He seemed no longer to breathe, so lost was he in the vision that shone upon his soul. Now and then he started slightly. The light which shone in his eyes grew brighter.

Some time passed thus. Then Cimourdain asked him:

"Of what are you thinking?"

"Of the future," replied Gauvain.

And he sank back into his meditation. Cimourdain rose from the bed of straw where the two were sitting. Gauvain did not notice it. Cimourdain, keeping his eyes fixed upon the dreamer, moved slowly backward toward the door and went out. The dungeon closed again.

VI.

WHEN THE SUN ROSE

Day broke along the horizon.

And with the day, an object, strange, motionless, mysterious, and which the birds of heaven did not recognize, appeared upon the plateau of La Tourgue and towered above the forest of Fougères.

It had been placed there in the night. It seemed to have sprung up rather than to have been built. It lifted high against the horizon a profile of straight, hard lines, looking like a Hebrew letter or one of those Egyptian hieroglyphics which made part of the alphabet of the ancient enigma.

At the first glance, the idea which this object roused was its lack of keeping with the surroundings. It stood there amidst the blossoming heath. One asked one's self for what purpose it could be useful? Then the beholder felt a chill creep over him as he gazed. It was a sort of trestle having four posts for feet. At one end of the trestle, two tall joists, upright and straight, and fastened together at the top by a cross-beam, raised and held suspended some triangular object which showed black against the blue sky of morning. At the other end of the staging was a ladder. Between the joists, at the bottom, and directly beneath the triangle, could be seen a sort of panel composed of two movable sections which, fitting close to each other, left a round hole about the size of a man's neck. The upper section of this panel slid in a groove, so that it could be hoisted or lowered at will. For the time, the two crescents, which formed the circle when closed, were drawn apart. At the foot of the two posts supporting the triangle was a plank turning on hinges, looking like a see-saw.

By the side of this plank was a long basket, and, between the two beams, in front and at the extremity of the trestle, a square basket. This was painted red. The whole was made of wood except the triangle which was iron. One would have known the thing had been constructed by man, it was so ugly and evil looking; at the same time it was so formidable that it might have been reared there by evil genii.

This mis-shapen thing was the guillotine.

In front of it, a few paces off, another monster rose out of the ravine—La Tourgue.

A monster of stone standing in companionship with the monster of wood. For, let us state, when man has touched wood or stone, the stone and wood no longer remain inanimate matter; something of man's spirit seems to enter into them. An edifice is a dogma, a machine an idea.

La Tourgue was that terrible offspring of the Past, called the Bastile in Paris, the Tower of London in England, the Spielberg in Germany, the Escurial in Spain, the Kremlin in Moscow, the Castle of Saint Angelo in Rome.

In La Tourgue were condensed fifteen hundred years, the Middle Age, vassalage, servitude, feudality; in the guillotine, one year, '93, and these twelve months made a counterpoise to those fifteen centuries.

La Tourgue was Monarchy; the guillotine was Revolution.

Tragic confrontation.

On one side the debtor, on the other the creditor. On one side the inextricable Gothic complication of serf, lord, slave, master, plebeian, nobility, the complex code ramifying into customs, judge and priest in coalition, shackles innumerable, fiscal impositions, excise laws, mortmain, taxes, exemptions, prerogatives, prejudices, fanaticisms, the royal privilege of bankruptcy, the sceptre, the throne, the regal will, the divine right; on the other, a unit—the knife.

On one side, the knot; on the other, the axe.

La Tourgue had long stood alone in the midst of this wilderness. There she had frowned with her machicolated casements, from whence had streamed boiling oil, blazing pitch, and melted lead; her oubliettes paved with human skeletons; her torture-chamber; the whole hideous tragedy with which she was filled; rearing her funereal front above the forest, she had passed fifteen centuries of savage tranquillity amidst its shadows, she had been the one power in this land, the one object of respect and fear; she had reigned supreme; she had been the realization of barbarism, and suddenly she saw rise before her and against her, something, more than a thing, someone as terrible as herself, the guillotine.

Stone sometimes appears endowed with a strange power of sight. A statue notices, a tower watches, the face of an edifice contemplates. La Tourgue seemed to be studying the guillotine.

She seemed to question herself concerning it.

What was that object?

It looked as if it had sprung out of the earth.

It was from there, in truth, that it had risen.

The sinister tree had germinated in the fatal ground. Out of the soil watered by so much of human sweat, so many tears, so much blood, out of the earth in which had been dug so many trenches, so many graves, so many caverns, so many ambuscades, out of this earth wherein had rotted the countless victims of countless tyrannies, out of this earth spread above so many abysses, wherein had been buried so many crimes, terrible germs, had sprung, on the appointed day, this unknown, this avenger, this ferocious sword-bearer, and '93 had said to the Old World: "Behold me."

And the guillotine had the right to say to the tower: "I am thy daughter."

And, at the same time, the tower, for those fatal objects possess a strange vitality, felt herself slain by this newly-risen force.

Before this formidable apparition La Tourgue seemed to shudder. One might have said that she was afraid. The monstrous mass of granite was majestic, but infamous; that plank with its black triangle was worse. The all-powerful fallen, trembled before the all-powerful risen. Criminal history was studying judicial history. The violence of by-gone days was comparing itself with the violence of the present; the ancient fortress, the ancient prison, the ancient seigneury where tortured victims had shrieked out their lives, that construction of war and murder, now useless, defenseless, violated, dismantled, uncrowned, a heap of stones, worth no more than a heap of ashes, hideous, magnificent, and dying, dizzy with the awful memories of all those by-gone centuries, watched the terrible living Present pass. Yesterday trembled before To-day; antique ferocity acknowledged and bowed its head before this fresh horror, the power which was sinking into nothingness opened eyes of fright upon this new-born terror. Expiring despotism stared at this spectral avenger.

Nature is pitiless; she never withdraws her flowers, her music, her joyousness, and her sunlight from before human cruelty or human suffering; she overwhelms man by the contrast between divine beauty and social hideousness; she spares him nothing of her loveliness, neither the wings of the butterflies nor the songs of the birds, in the midst of murder, vengeance, barbarism, he must feel himself watched by holy things; he cannot escape the immense reproach of universal nature and the implacable serenity of the sky. The deformity of human laws is forced to exhibit itself naked amidst the dazzling rays of eternal beauty.

Man breaks and destroys, man lays waste, man kills; but the summer remains summer, the lily remains the lily, the star remains a star.

Never had a morning dawned fresher and more glorious than this. A soft breeze stirred the heath, a warm haze rose amidst the branches; the forest of Fougères permeated by the breath of hidden brooks, smoked in the dawn like a vast censer filled with incense; the blue of the firmament, the whiteness of the clouds, the transparency of the streams, the verdure, that harmonious gradation of color from aquamarine to emerald, the groups of close-standing trees, the plots of grass, the peaceful fields, all breathed that purity which is Nature's eternal counsel to man. In the midst of all this rose the horrible front of human shamelessness; in the midst of all this appeared the fortress and the scaffold, war and punishment; the incarnations of the bloody age and the bloody moment; the owl of the night of the past and the bat of the cloud-darkened dawn of the future. In the presence of blossoming, odor-giving creation, loving and charming, the grand sky spread the golden light of the morning about La Tourgue and the guillotine, and seemed to say to man: "Behold my work and yours."

Such are the terrible reproaches of the sunlight.

This spectacle had its spectators.

The four thousand men of the little expeditionary army were drawn up in battle order upon the plateau. They surrounded the guillotine on three sides in such a manner as to form about it the shape of a letter E; the battery placed in the centre of the largest line made the notch of the E. The red monster was inclosed by these three battle fronts; a sort of wall of soldiers spread out on two sides to the edge of the plateau; the fourth side, the side left open, was the ravine, and faced La Tourgue.

These arrangements made a long four-sided enclosure, in the centre of which stood the scaffold. Gradually, as the sun mounted higher, the shadow of the guillotine grew shorter on the turf.

The gunners were at their pieces, the matches lighted.

A faint blue smoke rose from the ravine; the last breath of the expiring conflagration.

This smoke encircled without veiling La Tourgue, whose lofty platform overlooked the whole horizon. There was only the width of the ravine between the platform and the guillotine. The one could have parleyed with the other.

The table of the tribunal and the chair shadowed by the tricolored flags had been set upon the platform. The sun rose higher behind La Tourgue, bringing out the black mass of the fortress clear and defined, and revealing upon its summit the figure of a man in the chair beneath the banners, sitting motionless, his arms crossed upon his breast.

This man was Cimourdain. He wore, as on the previous day, the costume of a civil delegate; on his head was the hat with the tri-colored cockade, his sabre at his side, his pistols in his belt.

He sat silent. All were silent. The soldiers stood with downcast eyes and muskets grounded. Their shoulders touched, but no one spoke. They were meditating confusedly upon this war, the numberless engagements, the hedge-fusillades so bravely sustained, the hosts of furious peasants driven back by their might, the citadels taken, the battles won, the victories gained, and it seemed to them as if all that glory had now turned to their shame. A fearful expectation contracted every heart. They could see the executioner come and go upon the platform of the guillotine. The increasing splendor of the morning filled the sky with its majesty.

Suddenly they heard the sound of muffled drums. The funereal tones swept nearer; the ranks opened and a procession entered the square and moved toward the scaffold.

First, the drummers with their crape-wreathed drums, then a company of grenadiers with lowered muskets; then a platoon of gendarmes with drawn sabres; then the condemned,—Gauvain.

He walked forward with a free step. He had no fetters on hands or feet. He was in undress uniform. He wore his sword.

Behind him marched another platoon of gendarmes.

Gauvain's face was still lighted by that pensive joy which had shone upon it at the moment when he said to Cimourdain: "I am thinking of the future." Nothing could be more touching and sublime than that lasting smile.

When he reached the fatal square, his first glance was directed toward the summit of the tower. He disdained the guillotine.

He knew that Cimourdain would make it an imperative duty to assist at the execution. His eyes sought the platform. He saw him there.

Cimourdain was ghastly and cold. Those standing near him could not catch even the sound of his breathing.

Not a tremor shook his frame when he saw Gauvain.

In the meantime Gauvain moved toward the scaffold.

As he walked, he looked at Cimourdain, and Cimourdain looked at him. It seemed as if Cimourdain leaned upon that glance.

Gauvain reached the foot of the scaffold. He ascended it. The officer who commanded the grenadiers followed him. He unfastened his sword, and handed it to the officer; he undid his cravat, and gave it to the executioner.

He looked like a vision. Never had he been so handsome. His brown curls floated in the wind; at the time it was not the custom to cut off the hair of those about to be executed. His white neck reminded one of a woman, his heroic and sovereign glance made one think of an archangel. He stood there on the scaffold lost in thought. That place of punishment was also a height. Gauvain stood upon it, proud and tranquil. The sunlight streamed about him till he seemed to stand in the middle of a halo.

But he must be bound. The executioner advanced, cord in hand.

At this moment, when the soldiers saw their young leader so close to the knife, they could restrain themselves no longer; the hearts of those stern warriors gave way. A mighty sound swelled up, the united sob of a whole army. A clamor arose. "Mercy! mercy!" Some fell upon their knees; others flung away their guns and stretched their arms toward the platform where Cimourdain was seated. One grenadier pointed to the guillotine and cried: "Will you accept a substitute? Take me." All repeated frantically, "Mercy! mercy!" Had a troop of lions heard, they must have been softened or terrified, for the tears of soldiers are terrible.

The executioner hesitated, no longer knowing what to do.

Then a voice, quick and low, but audible to every ear, so stern was it, spoke from the top of the tower:

"Fulfill the law!"

All recognized that inexorable tone. Cimourdain had spoken. The army shuddered.

The executioner hesitated no longer. He approached, holding out the cord.

"Wait," said Gauvain.

He turned toward Cimourdain, made a gesture of farewell with his right hand, which was still free, then allowed himself to be bound.

When he was tied, he said to the executioner:

"Pardon. One instant more."

And he cried:

"Live the Republic!"

He was laid upon the plank. That noble head was held by the infamous yoke, the executioner gently parted his hair aside, then touched the spring, the triangle was set free and began to move, slowly at first, then rapidly, a terrible blow was heard . . .

At the same instant another report sounded. A pistol-shot had answered the blow of the axe. Cimourdain had seized one of the pistols from his belt, and, as Gauvain's head rolled into the basket, Cimourdain sank back pierced to the heart by a bullet his own hand had fired. A stream of blood burst from his mouth, he fell dead.

And those two souls, united still in that tragic death, soared away together, the shadow of the one mingled with the radiance of the other.
